Montgomery, James, Nov. 4, 1771-April 30, 1854, the son of a Moravian missionary, and a native of Irvine, Ayrshire, Scotland, after acquiring a good education at the Moravian institution at Fulneck, accepted in 1792 the post of assistant in the office of the Sheffield Register. Mr. Gales, the publisher, having used his pen on political subjects with more freedom than pleased the Government officers, and being obliged to leave suddenly for America to escape prosecution, his youthful colleague succeeded to his editorial honours and his legal persecutions. The name of the sheet he thought proper to change to that of The Sheffield Iris. In 1795 he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, and £20 fine, for publishing an alleged seditious libel, (the indictment was founded on a gross misrepresentation;) and in 1796 he was again imprisoned for six months, and fined £30, for printing an offensive account of the conduct of a magistrate who had been engaged in quelling a Sheffield riot in the preceding After an editorial career of more than thirty years, year. After an editorial career of more than inity years. Mr. Montgomery, in 1825, closed his connexion with the Iris. In 1835 he was complimented by the offer of Professorship of Rhetoric in the University of Edinburgh, but he had the good sense to refuse to accept a post which he was not likely to fill with advantage. The latter part of his life was usefully occupied in benevolent enterprises in Sheffield, where he lived comfortably on the profits which had accrued from the sale of his books, to which was added (in 1835) a pension of £150 and—far more highly prized the esteem and affection of a large circle of friends, who honoured him for his substantial worth whilst living, and lamented his death as a loss to the community. received the unusual honour of a public funeral, and his fellow-citizens immediately took measures to purchase the house in which he was born and preserve it as a monument to his memory. We do not know whether this project was carried out or not.

Montgomery first made his approaches to the public by the usual channel,—fugitive contributions to periodical literature. "Feel your way before you with the public, as Montgomery did," writes Robert Southey to Ebenezer Eliott, in 1808:

Elliott, in 1808:

"He sent his verses to the newspapers, and when they were copied from one to another it was a sure sign they had succeeded. He then communicated them, as they were copied from the papers, to the Poetical Register; the Review selected them for praised and then, when he published them in a collected form, he did gothing more than claim in his own character the praise which had been bestowed upon him under a fictitious name."—Boutley's Life and Chorresp., vol. xiv.

Ediott. The Sheffield Iris had much to do with the poetical reputation of the latter. See Montgomery's glowing, eulogy on his friend's poetry, Erlast, Engagemen, p. 552, aute. Montgomery soon acquired sufficient confidence from the favourable manner in which his humble offerings were received to venture upon more ambitious authorship. His publications appeared in the following order:

1. Prison Amusements, 1797. This vol. is composed of Poems written during his incarceration in York Castle.

2. The Ocean; a Poem, 1805. 3. The Wanderer of Switzer-land, and other Poems, 1806, 12mo; 3d ed. in the same

"We took compassion upon Mr. Montgomery on his first appearance; conceiving him to be some slender youth of seventeesy intoxicated with weak tea and the praises of sentimental ensigns and other provincial literati, and tempted, in that situation, to commit a feeble outrage on the public, of which the recollection would be a sufficient punishment. A third edition, however, is too alarming to be passed over to affence; and, though we are perfectly persuaded that in less than three years noboly will know the name of the Wanderer of Switzerland or any of the other poems in this collection, still we think ourselves called on to interfree, as prevent, as far as in as lies, the mischief that may arise from the intermediate provalence of so distressing an epidemic. It is hard to say what numbers of ingenious youth may be led it exposs themselves in public by the success of this performance, or what addition may be made in a few months to that great sinking-fund of bad taste which is daily wearing down the debt which we have so long owed to the classical writers of antiquity. . . . When svery day is bringing forth some new work from the pen of Scoti, Campbell, Rogers, Ballille, Sotheby, Wordsworth, or Scothey, it is natural to feel some disputs at the undistinguishing vorsicity which can swallow down three dictions of songs to convivia. societies and verses to a pillow."—Edin. Rev., ix. 347-358, Jan 1807.

So far from the Wanderer in Switzerland permitting himself to be quietly in-urned within three years from the time of this fatal wound,—as the assailant foully thought,—he has con-tinued to give unmistakable evidence of undiminished vigour, still retains his vitality, and is at this moment "wandering" through the world, a favoured guest at every fireside, and the companion alike of childhood and old are, of the youthful enthusiast who heliares all old age, of the youthful enthusiast who believes all things for which he hopes, to the incredulous and misanthropic worldling who credits nothing which he is not able to prove.

"Bryant," says Tuckerman, "when a boy knew Montgomery's Wanderer in Switzerland by heart."

Many years later, this youthful admirer—then himself richly laden with the coveted rewards of successful author ship - had the pleasure of a personal conference with one whose works had so large a share in the formation of his poetical taste. This interview occurred in June, 1853, at Montgomery's residence,—"The Mount," Shafield,—only ten months before the sweet singer of The Songs of Sion was advanced to a higher choir and permitted to essay a richer harmony in the courts of heaven. Lord Jeffrey's savage attack upon the modest Wanderer was not allowed to pass unrebuked. Among those who came to the rescue were Robert Southey, who despised any thing which savoured of Whiggiam, and John Wilson, whose formidable cudgel was always forward in defence of the

"His Wanderer of Switzerland," remarks Christopher North, on another occasion, "is certainly the least successful of all Mr. Montgomery's more ambitious poems. The plan of it is without originality or felicity of any kind; and the versification, though easy and flowing, is very monotonous—very much in the style of the see-saw school. We cannot sincerely say that it contains any very time passages; and had Mr. Montgomery written nothing clee his name would have had hat faint sound to our ears."—Blackus. Mag., xxil 99, Oct. 1821: Montgomery's Policum Island, de.

"The 'Wanderer of Switzerland," says a judicious critic, "could scarcely have attained its popularity either from its subject, which is local, or its treatment, which verges on commomplace, or from its poetical merits, which are not of the rurest; but along with it some fine lyrics were published, high-toned in sentiment and feeling, which nespoke the true touch and found an echo in many hearts."—Mor's Just. "like almost all poems written per order, is, on the whole, but a moderate performance. It subject, strictly speaking, is the slavetrade, it has, however, some fine passages... There is much strong writing in the other books; but they are often rather rhetorical than poetical, sometimes declamatory, and not seldom, though noisy, dull. Indignation alone will not make noble verses;
and the poets indignation degenerates into abuse. He did well to the subject: there are strokes of power and touches of pathes in every other page; the episodical passages are very beautiful."—

"We centainly think that Mr. Montgomery essayed a task of needless difficulty in carrying bis scene so far back into primeval antiquity and resting the main interest of his pown on an imaginary contest between the descendants of Cam and Seth, the catastrophe of which is the real assumption of Enoch. Still, the difficulty, though great, has not been unsuccessfully surmounted. Though the interest which his imaginary personages excite is not intense, and the movement of his story has little that produces suspense or curiosity, the characters are matural, the pictures of life and human feeling with which it abounds touching and solemn; and such passages as those which describe the first view of his native valley which opens to the repentant and returning Javan, the interview with her whom he had forsaken but could not forget, the death of Adam, the effect of Jubal's music on the distracted Cain, might have been chaimed, without injury to their fame, by the most distinguished among our poets."—Exim. "In 'Greenland' Mr. Montgomery appears for the first time to have found a theme at once calculated to be popular from the richness and variety of the poetical development of which it was susceptible and from being perfectly in unison with his own strongly-devotional cast of mind. . . . The descriptions are animated by the same spirit of reality and truth which dictated the idea of the poem. The vagueness which per vades the sketches of scenery in 'The Wanderer of Switzerland' has vanished. Every line is expressive, every feature is clear and sharply defined as the oligents themselves against the winter sky. "With the exception perhaps of Moore, Campbell, and Hemans, I doubt if an equal number of the lyrics of any other modern poet have so completely bund their way to the national heart, there to be enshrinced in hallowed remembrance. One great merit which may be claimed for James Montgomery is that he has encreached on no man's property as a poet: he has staked off a portion of the great common of literature for bimself and cultivated it according to his own taste and fancy."—Moir's Sketches of the Poet, Lid., 400., 155, 156.

This, it will be remembered, is the claim which the poet himself preferred at the public entertainment given in his honour at Sheffield in 1825, when he retired from the edi-torial chair of the Sheffield Iris.

But the most terrible castigation which Mr. Montgomery's verses provoked was performed in the sight of the readers of the 101st Edinburgh Review, for April, 1830, by one accustomed to the unsparing and unpitying use of the lash,—Mr. T. B. (now Lord) Macaulay. It will also be found in his lordship's Critical and Historical Rssays, 1854, i. 256-278. A notice of the 2d ed. of Montseasys, 1802, 1. 200-210. A nonce of site 2st can be agreed to genery's poem of Satan occupies the last two pages. The addition of The Omnipresence of the Deity, then before the relentless critic, was the eleventh, (dated 1830;) and we doubt not that many readers of this philippic thought that it would be the last. But we have seen that this poom has by this time (Feb. 1858) reached the 28th edition, and six of the last edits, have been pub. within the last ten years. People will buy what pleases them, critics to the contrary notwithstanding. We quote a few sentences from his lordship's strictures. After quoting a fable of Pilpay's, the reviewer remarks, this lordship's strictures. After quoting a fable of Pilpay's, the reviewer remarks,

"The writer evidently means to caution us against the practice of patients," a class of people who have more than once talked the pashit first whe meat sheirif errors, but who surely never played a more unifical trick than when they passed Mr. Robert Montgomery. We know nothing whatever short him, except what we have learned from his hooks, and from the private predicte to one of them, in which he appears to be itolog, his very best to look like a man of genius and sonsibility, though with less success than his strunous exertions deserve. We select him because his works have received more estimalisate pessies, and have deserved more unmixed contempt, than any which, as far as our knowledge extends, have appeared within the last stree or four years. The circulation of this private or four years. The circulation of this private or four years. The circulation of this proposed all comparison greater than that of Cary's Bante or the sets works of Coleridge. It might be of use to play instant to know, as ageneral rule, that what they steal in—to employ a street common its advertisements—of no use to any but the right owners. We make a discontinuous that advertisements—of no use to any but the right owners. We make a discontinuous him advertisements—of no use to any but the right owners. Mr. Robert Montgomery osinobt make similibrates for himself. A very few lines further on, we shed one which has every merk of originality, and on which, we will be bound, none of the poets whom he has pinndered will ever think of naking suprisals:

"The soul, aspiring, pants its source to mount,
As streams meander level with their Sount."

"We take this to be, on the whole, the worst similitade in the world. In the first place, no stream meanders, or can possibly meander, level with its fount. In the next place, if a treems did meander level with their founts, no two motions can be less like each other than that of meandering level and that of mounting upwards."—Essays, 1. 257, 265, 266, 267, 269, 276.

The reviewer then dismisses the unhappy victim with this narting combliment:

this parting compliment:

"Here we conclude. If our remarks give pain to Mr. Robert Montgomery, we are sorry for it. But, at whatever cost of pain to individuals, literature must be purified from this taint; and, to show that we are not actuated by any feelings of personal enmity towards him, we hereby give notice that, as soon as any beak shall by means of puffing much a second soliton, our intention it to do unto the writer of it as we have done unto Mr. Bobert Mont-

This review, as we have already remarked, was originally pnb. in April, 1830. Early in the same year, Mr. Edward Clarkson, author of Lectures on the Pyramids, &c., prepared a pamphlet of 164 pp., entitled Robert Montgomery and his Reviewers, with some Remarks on the Present State of English Poetry and on the Laws of Criticism. this treatise Mr. Montgomery is valiantly defended against the strictures of Fraser's Magazine and the Edinburgh Literary January Chalestone Literary Journal. Clarkson, who was not, even in 1830, acquainted with Montgomery, had previously reviewed some of his early productions favourably in the British Traveller and the Sunday Times. Fortunately (shall we say?) for the Edinburgh Reviewer, Clarkson's pampilet was in press when the critique of the latter first made its appearance. Mr. Macaulay has since become a great man; but where would he have been had he fallen into the hands of the redoubtable Clarkson? However, we have no right to make light of Mr. C.'s pamphlet; for we have never seen it, and it may be a most sensible produc-It is somewhat curious that in the month succeeding the appearance of Mr. Macaulay's critique Mr. Robert Southey writer to Mr. Montgomery, in acknowledging the receipt of a present of some (we know not which) of his

"Any single page of these volumes contains sufficient proof of the ardour and power with which any thing may be done when they are disciplined."—May 11, 1830. Yet six years later (Sept. 1836) Southey regretted, in a conversation with Dr. R. Shelton Mackenzie, that "Montgomery should have been as much overpraised at first as he was latterly abused." "Every reader of extracts from the writings of Dr. Moore must feel a strong desire to become more intimately acquainted with an author so conversant with men and manners and so emisent for the beneviolence of his heart and the purity of his morals, and thus be irresistibly induced to purchase all his works and place them in his library by the side of Johnson, Fielding, and Smollett."—Mosciana.

"As an author, Dr. Moore was more distinguished by the range of his information than by its accuracy or extent upon any particular subject; and his writings did not owe their celebrity to any great depth or even originality of thought. As a novelist, he showed no extraordinary felicity in the department of invention, no great powers of diversifying his characters or ease in conducting his narrative. The main quality of his works is that particular species of surdonic wit with which they are indeed, perhaps, profusely tinctured, but which frequently confers a grace and polynamy on the general strain of good sense and judicious observes that pervades the whole of them."—Thomas Camprall.: Bress-ster's Edin. Thomas command the mineral and an account of the state of tomers. Thomas commenced rhyming at an age so early that he was ever unable to fix the date of his first effusions; but he was only about fourteen when, to use his own words, he "had become a determined rhymer;" and, as youthful poetical genius is seldom retiring, he resolved to extend his circle of admirers beyond the indulgent group of auditors who listened to his verses around the family hearth. Therefore, on Sept. 11, 1793, he indited the following tulk original control of the cont lowing truly original epistle:

"To the Editor of the 'Anthologia Hibernica."

"Sr: --If the following attempts of a youthful muse seem work; of a place in your Magazine, by inserting them you will much oblige a constant reader.

The mystical obscurity under which the youthful bard saw fit to veil his name from the excited curiosity of the editor of the Anthologia is very observable. Perhaps some future Champellion may favour us with an inter-pretation of these abstruse characters. Encouraged by the prolitation of his verses, and unwilling that the world should "burst in ignorance" of the real designation of the new star which had assumed so proud a place in the poetical firmament, the author probably condescended to become more explicit; for he tells us

"My pride on seeing my own name in the first list of subscribers to this publication.—'Master Thomas Moore,' in full,—was only surpassed by that of finding myself one of its 'esteemed contributors.'"

His first two poems, thus rather ostentatiously ushered into the world, are worthy of notice as well from their own merit as from the evidence they afford of an early proclivity to a school of poetry which he afterwards cultivated with more zeal and success than prudence and profit.

"TO ZELIA. ON HER CHARGING THE AUTHOR WITH WRITING TOO MUCH ON LOVE

CHARGING THE AUTHOR WITH WRITIMO TOO ME
""Tis true my muse to love inclines,
And wreaths of Cypria's myrtle twines;
Quits all inspiring, lofty views,
And chants what Nature's gifts infuse;
Timid to try the mountain's height,
Beneath she strays, retired from sight;
Carcless, culling amorous flowers,
Or quasfling mirth in Bacchus' bowers.
When first she raised her simplest lays
In Cupid's never-cessing pruise,
The god a faithful promise gave
That never should she feel love's stings, Nover to burnine passion be a slave. Nover to burning passion be a slave,
But feel the purer joy thy friendship brings.

Anthologia Hibernica, Oct. 1793.

A PASTORAL BALLAD.

"My gardens are crowded with flowers, My vines are all loaded with grapes; Nature sports in my fountains and bowers And assumes all her beautiful shapes.

"The shepherds admire my lays:
When I pipe they all flock to the song;
They deck me with laurels and bays,
And list to me all the day long.

"But their laurels and praises are vain They've no joy or delight for me now; For Celia despises the strain, And that withers the wreath on my brow."

These are certainly creditable lines for a boy of fourteen: and the demise of the respectable periodical in which they and their successors appeared, at the close of its second ear, is not to be attributed to the lucubrations of "Master Thomas Moore, subscriber and contributor." When we hint to the historical collector that the four volumes of the short-lived Anthologia Hibernica contain An Extensive and Interesting Collection of Papers on the Antiquities, Superstitions, Celtic Remains, Science, History, and Belles-Lettres chiefly relating to Ireland, we presume that he will be glad to exchange a few shillings for so "desirable an addition to any gentleman's library."

The Anthologia died, says Moore, "as all such things die in that country, for want of money and—of talent; for the Irish never either fight or write well on their own $\frac{1}{10}$!"

After a careful drilling in the humaniores liters, under the vigilant eye of the famous pedagogue Samuel Whyte, also the preceptor of Richard Brinsley Sheridan,—in the summer of 1794, Moore was entered of Trinity College, Dublin, where he pursued his studies with considerable success, and took his degree of B.A. in 1798 or 199. In the latter year he came to London and entered himself of the Middle Temple; but now, relieved from the eye of a master, Poetry resumed its sway in his bosom, and, instead of the sedulous devotion which a proverbially "jealous mistress" demands, Law appears to have been treated with neglect, if not with contempt. A strong temptation to this unbusiness like preference was presented in an un-finished translation of the Odos of Auscreon, commenced at rollege, which he was able to complete and send to the press in the ensning year. In 1801, he gave to the world-Little to its benefit—the Poetical Works of the late Thomas Little; in 1803, he sailed to Bernuda to take possession of an office under Government—the Registrarship of the Admiralty—procured through the influence of Lord Moira; ir. November, 1804, after a tour in the United States, he was again in England, having left a deputy to supply his place in Bermuda; in 1811, he was married to Miss Bessy. Dyke, an admirable person and a true wife; in 1817, and again in 1819, he visited the continent, in the latter case residing in Paris until 1822; in this year he settled permanently at Shperton Cottage, (his temporary habitation in 1817-18,) about two miles from Devizes, on the way to Chippenham, and here remained for the rest of his life. For about three years before his death he was reduced, by softening of the brain, to a condition of mental incapacity. In 1835, he received a substantial compliment from the Government in the shape of an annual pension of £300. This addition to his income was most acceptable; for, although his pen proved an abundant source of profit,-his copyrights having paid him more than £20,000,-like many copyrights having patch im more than £20,000,—ince many of the sons of genius, he was an improvident financier. Mrs. Moore, the excellent "Bessy," who still lives, (we write in 1858,) enjoys a pension of £100 per annum, granted her in 1850 "in consideration of the literary merits of her husband and his infirm state of health;" and this sum, with the interest of £3000 paid by Longman for the copyright of Moore's Memoirs, Journal, and Correspondence, supports her in that comfort which so devoted a wife eminently deserves. To Moore's affection for his "Bessy," the cheerful companion of his youth and the self-sacrificing nurse of his old age, we have heard an eloquent tribute paid by one to whom Moore was bound by no ordinary ties of friendship,-our countryman, Wash-Ington Irving. Moore's publications appeared in the fol-lowing order. 1. The Odes of Anacreon; translated into English Verse, with Notes and three plates, Lon., 1800, 4to, pp. 280; 2d ed., 1802, 2 vols. 12mo; some on large paper; 3d ed., 1803, 2 vols. 12mo; 8th ed., 1813, 2 vols. 8vo. The publication of this work elicited a neat impromptu from the Hon. Henry Erskine:

"Ah, mourn not for Anacreon dead; Ah, weep not for Anacreon fied: The lyre still breathes he touch'd before, For we have one Anacreon Moore!"

"Moore's early fancy luxuriated among the classics, and his eleaccount early many maximized among the classics, and his elegant, spirited, and congenial translation—say rather paraphrase—of Anaroson was the first fruits."—Moir's Sketches of the Post. Lit. of the Post Half-Century, 197.

"It may be doubted whether the interests of morality required that Anaroson should be accounted to the results in a result of the results."

"It may be doubted whether the interests of morality required that Anacron should be presented to the public in a new and more seductive dress. . . If there he any truth in the preceding observations, we cannot be expected to award to Mr. Moore the praise of being a faithful interpreter. . . We think Mr. Moore has damped the fire of his work by a profusion of epithets. . . . Younge's translation is well fitted for a pot-house; Moore's is much better calculated for a bagulo. . A style so wantonly voluptuous is at once effeminate and childlen; and it is as unlike the original as it is unmanly in itself." "Ms. Erne: Ethin. Rev., ii. 462-476.

this severe but to some extent well-merited indicament we select a few passages:

"He may beast if the boast can please him, of being the most licentions of modern versifiers, and the most portical of those who in our times have devoted their talents to the propagation of hamorality. We regard his book, indeed, as a public anisance, and would willingly trample it down by one short movement of cuntempt and indignation, had we not reason to apprehend that it was abetted by patrons who are cutified to a more respectful remembrance and by admirers who may require a more extended exposition of their dangers. . . It seems to be his aim to impose corruption upon his readers by concealing it under the mask of refinement; to reconcile them imperceptibly to the most vile and vulgar sensuality by blending its language with that of exalted feeling and tender enotion: and to steal impurity into their hearts by gently perverting the most simple and generous of their affections. by gently percerting the most simple and generous of their affections. In the execution of this unworthy task he labours with sperseverance at once ludicrous and detectable. A publication which we would wish to see consigned to universal reprobation."—vil. 466-465.

Instead of acknowledging his error and feeling grateful for a castigation so faithfully administered, Moore added to his original offence by challenging his reviewer; and the latter was foolish enough to accept the invitation to the performance of a "gentlemanly" murder. The parties met at Chalk Farm, and were waiting the word to fire, when their agreeable amusements were interrupted by some Bow Street officers, who took the belligerents into custedy. A few days afterwards, Jeffrey acknowledged that, in "the opinion not only of himself but his friends, the review contained too much that was exceptionable, and that be was sincerely sorry for having written it." Henceforth the parties were steadfast friends. A full account of this worse than foolish affair, drawn up by the poet himself, will be found in Moore's Memoirs, vol. i., 1853, 199-214. In a later review, from which we shall hereafter have occasion to quote, Jeffrey pays a handsome compliment to Moore's improved literary morality.

"Many of the pieces in this collection he has never since excelled; as the Lines at the Cohes, or Fells of the Mohawk River, The Epistic of Lord Strangford, Peace and Glory, Dead Man's Isla, and the Canadian Boat-Rong,"—Moir's Skeiches of the Pact. Lit., &c.,

107. "The Odes, Ppistles, Translations, and Ballads of Mr. Moore," remarks Dr. Diblin, in 1824, "are, beyond all doubt, of a first-rate class of character. The case and felicity of the verse, excelsed on palpably congenial subjects, have scarcely any thing to cellipse their in the tender pages of Tibulius or Catuffus."—Lib. Comp., 740

'In the manner of Ackermann's dresses for May.'

"In the manner of Ackermann's dresses for May."

His light, agreeable, polished style pierces through the body of the court, hits off the faded graces of 'an Adonis of fifty,' weighs the vanity of fashion in fremulous scales, mimics the grimace of affectation and folly, shows up the littleness of the great, and spears a phalanx of statesmen with its glittering point as with a dlamond broach."—Haciti's Sprit of the Age.

Blackwood's Magazine speaks in a very different strain:

"Have we (the Tories) insulted female character and outraged female feeling as the author of the infamous Twopenny PostBag! Have we ransacked all the rancorous records of political hate to acrape up the vile personal attacks upon private life which form the attraction of the equally-infamous Fudge Family !"—Ext.

"James Power, a music-publisher in London, employed Moore from 1806 to 1836 (when Power died) to write the Irish Melodies and other songs for him. For the Melodies alone he paid him £500 a year during those thirty years. There are 124 Melodies; and, as the whole amount received by Moore was £15.000.—to say nothing of loss of interest, which would more than quadruple it by arithmetical progression,—Moore actually received £121 for each of these songs. Their average length was twenty lines,—which would make the payment over £1, or $30. a line P—Ds. R. Bestrog Magensie: Noctes Ambroa, 1855, i. 392, n.

We give these remarks as we find them, without re-rence to the controversy respecting the Moore and ference to the controversy respecting the Power correspondence, in connexion with which they will be found in our authority. Of six commendatory notices before us of this splendid book we have room for one only:

book, we have room for one only: book, we have room for one only:

"We have seen the best illustrations of the best European literature; and, before the appearance of this edition of the 'Irish Melodies,' we had nothing, as a whole, comparable to certain of the continental series of compositions from national and popular literature; but this work, with its profuse wealth of poetical conception and exquisite composition, distances every thing skin to the great family of illustrated books. Indeed, every specimen that we have hitherto seen falls immensely short of the respiendent paper now befure us, which Maclise has profusely strewn with Bowers, all 'immortelles,' untiting in one unfading wreath."—Los. Art Union.

Mr. Moore, in the preface to this edition, says,

"I shall only add that I deem it most fortunate for this edition that the rich imaginative powers of Mr. Maclise have been employed in its adornment, and that to complete its national chatacter as Irish pencil has lent its aid to an Irish pen in rendering fine honour and homage to our country's ancient harp."

New edits. of the Melodies were issued by Longman in 1851, '53, '54, '55, '56, and '57. An edit, with Symphonies by Sir John Stevenson, 1857, sm. fol., 31s. 6d., must not be neglected by the musical reader. Messrs. Oliver Ditson & Co., of Boston, pub. an excellent edition, (1857,) in which some of the songs have two arrangements, one being that of Sir John Stevenson, the other that which is most popular in America; embellished with a portrait of the poet, and prefaced with a Sketch of his Life and of the History of the Work. We may mention in this conthe History of the Work. We may mention in this con-mexion that Moore was greatly delighted at hearing of the first transatiantic edition of the Melodies: "Bo you know," he writes to Mr. Power, Sept. 24, 1816, "that there is an edition of my Melodies published in Philadelphia? I was we could get them."—Memoira, il. 110. It will be remembered that Moore preferred Philadelphia?

At will be remembered that Moore preferred Philadelphia to any other place visited by him during his tour through a portion of the United States, in 1804. Speaking of his friends in this city, he remarks, "I spit quite a regret in leaving them; and the only place which have noe, which I had one wish to pause in, was Philadelphia."

Light to his Mather, Passaick Palls, June 26, 1804: Memoira. I.164.

If we should be reminded that Moore's pictures of Amelian life, was not Entering.— for instance, the lines com-rican life are not flattering, for instance, the lines com^{es} Mind. Inlaid alone, in barren, still repose, Nor blooms, nor rises, nor expande, nor flows,"

Nor blooms, nor rises, nor expands, nor flows,"— we answer that we doubt not that the poet's portraiture, perhaps not without exaggeration, had sufficient truth in it to bontery a wholseome lessen to those who certainly are made to appear to very little advantage.

Messer also refers to two translations of his Molodies into Resistan, (Messeris, v. 5.), and also to a Polish vermica, (Messeris, vill 198.) But let us come nearer home for and opinious of these famous songs. Lord Byron hailed periodizers with rapture. He writes, after reading one or near the easing numbers, then recently first published, Brits no sense of Moore's last Reiss sparks, "As a Seam over the shop the Wesser," When the who advant Thes. "Oh, blams not!" and "Oh, breathe not his name!" are worth all the epics that ever were composed."

"Moore," says his lordship, "is one of the fire writers who will survive the age in which he so deservedly flourishes. He will live in his Irish Melodies. They will go down to postorier with the music: both will last as long as Ireland, or as music and poetry."

Lord John Russell remarks on the above, "When we remember that to these early Irish Melodies were added so many numbers of Irish Melodies, National Melodies, and added so many numbers of Irish Melodies, National Melodies, and Sacred Songs, each full of the most exquisite poetry, it is impossible not to be lost in admiration at the fancy and the fueling of which the spring was so abundant and the waters so clear, the chiure, freeche, e doici acque which seemed to flow perennially from an inexhaustible fountain."—Memorre, vol. i., Pref., xxii.

"His Irish and National Molodies will be immortai: and they will be so for this reason,—that they express the feelings wheis spring up in the breast of every successive generation at the most important and imaginative period of life. They have the delicacy of refined life without its fustiliousness, the warmth of natural feeling without its rudeness."—Sir Arch, Alison: Hiel. of Europs, 1816–52, chap. v.

But there is something to be said on the child.

But there is something to be said on the other side:

"There is [in the Irish Melodies] a liquid ease, a dance : f words, and a lyrical grace and brevity in them all; but there is, likewise, an epigrammatic point and smartness, a courtly and a knowing air, so to speak, allen to the simplicity of the music and to the nature of song. . . . In one word, there is not a little affectation in them, puton graces, and artificial raptures. These faults are nearly balanced by beauties."—Allen Cunninghan's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833.

Mr. Healt Fifty Ears, 1833.

Mr. Hazlitt finds still less to commend:

Mr. Hazlitt finds still less to commenc:
"If these national airs do indeed express the soul of impassioned feeling in his countrymen, the case of Ireland is hopeless. If these prettinesses pass for patriotism, if a country can heave from its heart's core only these vapid, varnished sentiments, lip-deep, and let its tears of blood evaporate in an empty conceit, let it be governed as it has been. There are here no tones to waken liberty, to console humanity. Mr. Moore converts the wild harp of Eria into a musical saud-box!"—The Sparit of the Age: Mr. T. Moore,—Mr. L. Hunt.

Of all the flattering eulogies which were so lavishly showered upon the favourite bard,—and, like most poets, the author of the Melodies lent no unwilling ear to the dulcet sounds, -perhaps no tribute from noble lord or lady fair better pleased him than the following evidence of popularity, which we must let him tell in his own words. Under date of 10th and 11th May, 1842, he records in his Diary, of 10th and 11th May, 1842, he records in his Diary,

"Found, with my usual good luck, a note from Murray, asking me to meet at dinner to day the man of all others I wanted to shake hands with once more. —Washington Irving, [See our Life of Washington Irving, p. 938, ante.] Called at Murray's to say 'Yee, yes, with all my heart'. —The best thing of the evening (as far as I was concerned) occurred after the whole grand show was over.
Irving and I came away together; and we had hardly got into the street when a most politing shower came on, and cabs and umbrelias were in requisition in all directions. As we were provided with neither, our plight was becoming serious, when a common caid ran up to me, and said, 'Shall I get you a cab. Mr. Moore! Sure ain't I the man that patronises your Meoldes?' He then ran off in search of a vehicle, while Irving and I stood close up, like a pair of male curyatides, under the very narrow projection of a halidoor lodge, and thought at last that we were quite forgotten by my patron. But he came faithfully back; and, while putting me into the cab, (without minding at all the trifle I gave him for his trouble,) he said confidentially in my ear, 'Now, mind: whenever you wast a cab, Misthur Moore, just call for Tim Flaherty, and I'm your mun.' Now, this I call fame, and of somewhat a more agreeable kind than that of Dante, when the women in the street found him out by the marks of hell-fire on his board. (See Ginguené.)"—

Mr. James Perry, of the Morning Chronicle, writes to Moore, July 25, 1814, that, in a conversation with Longman respecting Lalla Rookh, the latter said

"That he understood from Mr. Orms I have mentioned the sum of three thousand gainess as the price that I thought you should fix upon it; and that this sum was so large as to make him degrous of seeing the copy of the poem before he made up his mind.' Memoirs, vill. 177.

Longman purchased it at the sum named. honour let it be recorded that two-thirds of the price was left in the hands of the publisher for the benefit of the author's aged parents.

"Mr. Moore," says Hazlitt. "ought not to have written Lalla Rookh, even for three thousand guineas. His fame is worth more than that. He should have minded the advice of Fadladern. It is not, however, a failure so much as an evasion and a consequent disappointment of public expectation. . . . Lalla Rioski is not what people wanted to see whether Mr. Moore could do,—namely, whether he could write a long epic poem. It is four short tales. The interest, however, is often high-wrought and tragic; but the execution still turns to the effeminate and voluptuous side."

Mr. Breen stamps this dictum as a "noticeable sample of critical cant." (See Modern Literature, Its Blemishes and Defects, 1857, 192.)
Certainly Mr. Hazlitt's censure does not appear to have received much countenance. We have no space for one-tenth part of the praises which have been lavished on Lalla Rookh. The poet was wonderfully successful in transfusing the spirit of Oriental life into the physical features of Eastern scenery, customs, and manners. Jekyll used to declare that reading Lalla Rookh was "as good as riding on the back of a camel:" and the Persians hang in delighted admiration over their version of what it is hard for them to believe a foreign poem.

"There is a great deal of our recent poetry derived from the Bast; but this is the first Orientalism we have yet had. The land of the Sun has never shone out so brightly on the children of the North, nor the sweets of Asia been poured forth nor her gorgeousness displayed so profusely to the delighted senses of Europe.

It is amazing, indeed, how much at home Mr. Moore seems to be in Tradia, Paris, and Asia and how receive and estimate Asiatical. as to amount, more of now much at nome Mr. Moore seems to be in India, Persia, and Arabia, and how purely and strictly Asiatic all the colouring and imagery of his book appears?—Loan JEFFREY: Edia, Rev., xxix. 1-35; and his Control to the Edin. Rev., 1863, 509—

"He has, by accurate and extensive reading, imbued his mind "He has, by accurate and extensive reading, imbued his mind with so familiar a knowledge of Rastern scenery that we feel as if we were reading the poetry of one of the children of the Sun. No European image ever breaks or steaks in to destroy the illusion; every tone and her and form is purely and intensely Asiatic; and the language, faces, forms, dresses, mien, sentiments, passions, actime, and characters of the different agents are all congenial wit the flowery earth they inhabit and the burning sky that glows eve, their heads."—Blackw. "Of Lalla Rookh and the Loves of the Angels we defy you to read a page without admiration: but the question recurs,—and it is easily answered, we need not say, in the negative.—did Moore ever write a great poem?"—PROF. WILSON: Recreations of Christopher North: As Mour's Talk about Poetry.

"The sparkling genius of Moore, easting off the unworthy associations of its earlier years, fied back to its native regions of the sun, and blended the sentiment and elevation of the Wort with the charms of Oriental imagery and the brilliancy of Asiatic thought."—Six Archibald Alison: Hist. of Europe, 1789-1815, chap. 1

Lalla Rookh remains an onduring monument of the charm produced by the clothing of Oriental images and adventure with the genius and refinement of the Western world. But, though charming to pursons of general reading and varied information. It will never be no popular with ordinary readers as those tyric possis which express the feelings of the universal heart."—Ibid.: Hist. of Barope, 1816-52, chap. v.

"It leads shown in the poetry selected for the Irish Melodies, and more to in his celebrated Lalla Rookh, how beautifully the feelings of a delibest passion can be conveyed in hangange of the most brilliant and powerful description."—Dibidis's Lib. Chap., 749.

"Its great charm consists in the romance of its situations and characters, the splendour of its sketion and style, and the publical conjugations of its interpolarical fault is want of segment its is overloaded with ornament; you cannot see the green tour for power; you cannot see the blue heavens for stame; and the narrative is thus clogged, while its interest is marred. — Metalors of the Figs. Lin., dr., 201.

Lord Macanlay. in his admirable paper on Lord Bacon, referring to the philosopher's passion for strained analogies, as our so curiously illustrated in the third book of De Augmentis,

"If the making of inguitous and sparkling similitudes like these he indeed the philosophia prima, we are quite sure that the greatest philosophical work of the nineteenth century is Mr. Motre's Lalla Rookh?"—Crit. and Hest. Robus, 1854, il. 292.

"Lalla Rookh" had done the same I need never have written again,"

"With some omissions and perhaps a few mistakes, some little faults of style and some precipitate opinions, we do not hesitate to characterize this volume as the best historical notice yet published of the events of our own times,—going back, as persons of our antiquity naturally do in using such a phrase, to the earlier part of the late reign, and coming down pretty nearly to its termination. . . . The style of this work has been much criticised, we believe, and has been generally thought too figurative, brilliant, and poetical for the solviety of historical writing. It might have had worso faults."—LORD JEPRUX: £din. Rev., 18.1, 14.8, Dec. 1820. And see his Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1803, 792-798.

"Dr. Watkine's Memoirs of the Politician appears to us to be "the better work of the two, as decidedly as Mr. Moore's is of the Mathor. But an adequate, or even a tolerably faithful. life of Sherkian in the whole scope and combination of his character, is still, and may probably long continue to be, a desideratum. . . . Moore's is a work throughout which the ingenious author certainly appears to have kept treadily in mind the advice (quoted by Shimself) of his countryman Curran: 'When you can't talk sense, talk motaphor.' To Mr. Moore we are also indebted for the completion, of the translation of Sallust left unfinished by Mr. Mury by, pub. 1807, 8vo. He contributed, as we have seen, to the Edinburgh Review, (and it was greatly desired that he should become editor of that able periodical,) also to the London Times, Lon. Morning Chronicle, Dublin Magazine, &c. He commenced with much ardour the preparation of a Life of the Rev. Sydney Smith, but did not live to complete it. In 1840, he undertook the superintendence of the publication of a complete edition of his Poetical Works: it was pub. at an expense of over £7000, 1840-42, in 10 stanthly 12mo vols. We have yet much to say of Moore's general characteristics as an author, of his conversational abilities, and his wonderful powers as a singer of his own melodies,—many testimonies to quote of the admiration and esteem with which he was regarded by his attached friends,—by Byron, Beott, Lord John Russell, and others; but our article is already too long, and the time of quotation is past. "I heard Moore sing some of his melodies last night. . . . Much as I had admired the Irish Melodies before. I had not the least idea, not could any one have the least idea, of their exquisite poetry fill heard from the lips of the bard himself.—the bard literally. I suppose no species of musical performance can give one so nearly the idea of Phenices or Demoditus singing their own composition. . . The deep feeling, the perfect harmony of measure, words, and air, so carries one away that all appears one blended whole of exstacy."—Portfolio of a Man of the World, 1822: Lon. Gent. Mag., 1835, Pt. 2, 490.

"Moore has a peculiarity of talent, or rather talents.—poetry, music, voice—all his own, and an expression in each which never was, nor will be, possessed by another. But he is capable of still higher flights of poetry. By-the-by, what humour, what every thing, in the 'Post-Bag'! There is nothing Moore may not do, if he will but seriously set about it. In seciety he is gentlemanly, gentle, and altogether more pleasing than any individual with whom I am acquainted. For his honour, principle, and independence, his conduct to . . . speaks trumpet-tongued. He has but one fault,—and that one I daily regret: he is not here."—Loan Braon: Life, vol. ii. Introduced by these productions to Garrick, Dr. Johnson, Burke, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and other literary leaders of the day, her manners and conversation confirmed the good impression elicited by her talents; and the position in society originally conceded as a favour was soon acknow-ledged as a well-established right. Dr. Johnson tells us on one occasion that he had

"dined at Mrs. Garrick's with Mrs. Carter, Miss Hannah More, and Miss Fauny Burney: three such women are not to be found. I know not where I could find a fourth,—except Mrs. Lennox, who in superior to them all."

On another occasion, after one of the sisters had been describing their way of life, the (not always) gruff dogmatist exclaimed.

"I love you both!—I love you all five! I never was at Bristol:
I will come on purpose to see you. What! Five women live happily together? I will come and see you. I have spent a happy evening. I am glad I came. God forever bless you! Your lives shame duchesses!"

Garrick was not a whit behind his old schoolmaster in Garrick was not a whit behind his old schoolmaster in admiration of the author of The Scarch after Happiness. Garrick called her "The Tenth Muse." he afterwards changed it to "Nine;" and Horace Walpole styled her his Hall Hannah. It will readily be believed that the fortunate young lady found a mouth's visit to London an agreeable relief from the duties of the femule seminary constituted by the state of the femule seminary. dacted by herself and her sisters at Bristol. In 1778 Miss More produced her tragedy of Percy, and in 1779 her last tragedy,—The Fatal Falschood. Both of these pieces were asted at Covent-Garden. Shortly after this period the authoress felt obliged to confess, to quote her own words from the preface to the 3d vol. of her works, that she did not "consider the stage in its present state as becoming the appearance or countenance of a Christian; on which socieus she thought proper to renounce her dramatic pro-finetions in any other light than as mere poems." • Her literary labours after this date will be seen at a glance

A Selection from her Works, in 9 vols. r. 18mo, £2 5e., was pub. by P. Jackson, 1847—49, her Miscellencous Works by Tegg, 1840, 2 vols. 8vo, and her "Poetical Works" by Scott, 1838, 18mo. New edits, of several of her productions have appeared within the last few years. The sale of many of her religious and moral tracts has been very large. Of The Cheap Repository series (a number of which were written hy her) 2,000,000 copies were sold in the first year; and, more than 150,000 of one of the best of them—the excellent story of The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain-have been put into circulation. Nor must her many political tracts in defence of the English Constitution against the Revolutionary party be passed over without respectful remembrance. Her life, by Wm. Roberts, (sold for £2000,) was pub. in 1834, 4 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1834, 4 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 4 vols. p. 8vo; again, 1838, 2 vols. p. 8vo; abridged, (Chris. Fam. Lib., vol. xxviii.,) 1848, fp. 8vo. The Lon. Quarterly Reviewer (lii. 416) expresses an equally unfavourable opinion of Mr. Roberts's editorial labours. Another Life of Hannah More, by the Rev. H. Thompson, was pub. in 1838, p. 8vo; and still another, by Mrs. R. Smith, in 1844, 8vo. Hannah More was never married,—although she was at one time engaged to Mr. Turner, who postponed the match until the lady saw fit to postpone it altogether. Against her earnest protestations, this gentleman settled an annuity upon her as an evidence of his respect, esteem, &c. In 1786, she carried into execution a long-cherished plan, and retired to her "little thatched hermitage" at Cowslip Green, at Wrington, ten miles on the Exeter road from Bristol. In 1790, her sisters resigned the school over which they had presided for a number of years, and became inmates of her little establishment, the family occasionally residing in a house which they had built in Bath. In 1802, Hannah More and her sisters removed to Barley Wood, and in 1828, the former, the only survivor of the family, removed from this place to Windsor Terrace, in Clifton. The sale of her works was sufficiently large to afford a profit to the author of £30,000, which large sum enabled her to do much for the education and support of the poor of the neighbourhood in which her lot was east. She also left charitable bequests amounting to upwards of £10,000. The famous Sunday-schools at Cheddar (the beginning of a circle of operations which embraced 1200 children in its beneficent Miss More at Cowslip Green. This gentleman, it may be remembered, expressed great satisfaction with his perusal of Miss More's best-known work of fiction, (1808, 2 vols.

"Colebs I am really delighted with. I have been kept up hight ster night reading it after supper. I hope, too, that it will do as much good as such a composition from its very nature can do. Me will, I trust, draw on to other and more serious studies."

Sydney Smith is much less enthusisetic, (see Edin. Rev., xiv. 145, or Smith of orks, 1854, i. 309;) but it was the fault of the reversed critic to insist upon being funny in all seasons,—in or out of the boundaries of good taste and propriety. Coslebs sertainly pleased, or at least interested, the public; for the first edition was sold in a fortnight, and eleven editions were printed in nine months.

More, Henry, D.D., 1611-1687, a native of Grantham, Lincolnshire, educated at and Fellow of Christ's College Cambridge; became tutor to several young persons of rank, and for a time was Rector of Ingoldsby, which post be resigned in 1612. He spent the most of his life in studious retirement, from which neither the offer of the Mastership of his college nor the prospect of a bishopric could tempt him. He was a man of profound learning and of eminent piety. Dr. Outram said that he "looked upon More as the holiest person upon the face of the earth." He was a devont disciple of Plato, and a great admirer of Luther's favourite book, the Theologia Germanica of John Taulerus. He wrote some of his books and spent much of his time at Lord Conway's seat in Warwick-bire. The best-known of his works are—1. Philosophical Poems, Camb., 1647, Svo. a son of Bir John More, a Justice of the Court of King's Bench, was educated at Canterbury College, now part of Christ's Church, Oxford; subsequently pursued the study of the law at New Inn, and afterwards at Lincoln's Inn; was made a Privy Councillor in 1516; knighted and made Treasurer of the Exchequer in 1521; Speaker of the House of Commons, 1523; Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, 1525; Lord-Chancellor of England, Oct. 25, 1529-May 16, 1532; opposed the king's divorce from Queen Catherine and his marriage with Anne Boleyn, and, refusing to take the outh to maintain the statute asserting the legality and enforcing the validity of this union, and refusing also to acknowledge the ecclesiastical supremacy of lionry VIII., after thirteen months' imprisonment, was declared guilty of high-treason, and executed on Tower Hill. More was one of the most profound scholars and one of the most truly religious men of his time. He was twice married, first, to Miss Jane Colt, and, after her death, to Alice Mid-He was a dicton, a widow and seven years his senior. zealous advocate of the doctrines of the Church of Rome, and, notwithstanding the tolerant principles at times proclaimed in his Utopia, has been denounced for his alleged persecution of Protestants. "God has not often combined charity with enthusiasm. When he has done so he has produced his noblest work.—a More or a Fencion?—WM. II. Prescorr: Miscellanies, 1855, 300: from N. Amer. Ren., Jan. 1841

This dictum itself is a pleasing instance of "charity;" but those who would see how stout an argument can be maintained on the other side have only to refer to some of the more ancient of the authorities cited by us on a

The volume from which we have just quoted the vindi-catory declaration of More, (pp. 1458, double columns,) the only English collective ed. of his works, is now very rare, and has been sold at from £8 to £15. From this volume Dr. Johnson makes copious quotations in the History of the English Language prefixed to his Dictionary. After some citations from Chief-Justice Fortescue's Difference between an Absolute and Limited Monarchy, he proeneds:

"Of the works of Sir Thomas More it was necessary to give a "Of the works of Sir Thomas More it was necessary to give a larger specimen, both because our language was then in a great degree formed and settled, and because it appears from Bon Jonson that his works were considered as models of pure and elegant style. . . There is another reason why the extracts from this author are more copious: his works are carefully and correctly printed, and may therefore be better trusted than any other edition of the English books of that or the preceding ages."

This is in his service of the View of August 1997.

Dibdin, in his reprint of the Utopia, devotes 56 pages (4to ed., 1808) to an examination of More's folio, remark-

($10 etc., 1000) to all examination of scale of the lose of his observations,

"More's controversial writings—on which he bestowed most pains and counted most confidently for future fanne—have long fallen into utter oblivion, the very titles of most of them having perished. But the composition to which he attached no importance—which, as a jet d'esprit, occupied a few of his idle hours when retired from the bar, and which he was with great difficulty prevailed upon to publish—would of itself have made his name immortal. Since the time of Plato, there had been no composition given to the world which, for imagination, for philosophical discrimination, for a familiarity with the principles of government, for a knowledge of the springs of human action, for a keen observation of men and manners and for felicity of expression, could be compared to the Utopla."—Lord Campbell's Lives of the Lord-Chancellors: Life of Sir Thomas More.

"We must not leave England without mention of the only work of genius that she can boast in this age,—the Utopia of Sir Thomas More. The people of The Happy Republic certainly enjoyed

The people of The Happy Republic certainly enjoyed one advantage, which we trust will be universal before a great while:

"Utopus, the founder of the state, made a law that every man might be of what religion he pleased and might endeavour to draw others to it by force of argument and by ambible and mudest ways; but those who need reproaches or violence in their attempts were to be condemned to banishment or slavery."

But-alas for the miserable Utopians !--they had few laws and no lawyers.

2. The Historie of the Pittiful Life and Unfortunate Death of King Edward V. and the Duke of York, his Brother, with the Troublesome and Tyrannical Government of the Usurpation of Richard III. and his Miserable End, [written about 1509–16,] edited by W. Sheares, 1641, 12mo: pub. previously, and subsequently in Kennet's Collections; last ed., revised, 1821, 8vo, large paper. Dr. Dibdin concedes—perhaps somewhat too hastily—that this work was written by Archbishop Morton. (Dibdin's edit. of the Utopia, t. lxxxii.—lxxxvii., and his Lib. Comp., 524—525.) Lord Campbell (Lives of the Lord-Chancellors) suggests that Cardinal Morton

"probably furnished the materials for it to his precedious page, having been intimately mixed up with the transactions which it relates."

Cressore More, Sir Thomas's great-grandson and biographer, calls the history "incomparable," and complains that the English edition contains many errors.

"Sir Thomas More's Life of Edward V., written shout 1509, appears to me the first example of good English language, pure and perspicuous, well chosen, without valuarism or pesantry. ... I should name the account of Jane Shore as a model of slegant earry ration. ... His polemical tracts are inferior, but not ill written."

"More is the first of Rurope, 4th ed., 1854, 1.447, See also 312, "More is the first person in our history distinguished by the faculty of public speaking. ..., He is to be considered histo at our earliest prose-writer, and as the first Englishman who wrote the history of his country in its present language. The historical fragment commands belief by simplicity and by abstinence from too confident affirmation. . . A very small part of his vecabulary has been superanneated: the number of terms which require any explanation is incomiderable; and in that respect the stability of the language is remarkable. He is, indeed, it his words, more English than the great writers of a century after him, who loaded their native tongue with expressions of Greek or Latin derivation.—Size James Macriwrosu Life of More.

"Unlike the servile laboriousness of Fabyan, it is written with manifest containton of classical models: it is ornote verbus, dissincts remientity—and has might be expected from the friend and pupil of Erasmus tuning a reductant language to somewhat affected graces and anticipating with uncertain endeavours the copiousness and harmony it was one day destined as display."—Jon's ALLEN, M.D.: Eties. Rev., Itil. 4: Linguard's Hist. of Eng.

As regards the accuracy of this history. Hume remarks.

As regards the accuracy of this history, Hume remarks, "No historian either of ancient or modern times can possibly have more weight. He may justly be esteemed a contemporary with regard to the murder of the two princes; and it is plain from his narraitive that he had the particulars from the eye-witnesses themselves."

Portions of this history have been attacked by Walpole and Laing and defended by Sharon Turner and Dr. Lingard.

"The Latin Epigrams of Mora—a small volume which it required two years to carry through the press at Basic—are mostly translations from the Anthologia, which were rather made known to Europe by the fame of the writer than calculated to increase it... His Latinity was of the same school with that of his triend Erasmus,—which was, indeed, common to the first generation of scholars after the revival of classical study."—Sin James Mackinform: Life of More.

"More's 'Epigrammata,' though much admired in their day, not only in England, but all over Europe, are now only inspected by the curious who wish to know how the Latin language was cultivated in the reign of Henry VII. The collection in its present form was printed at Basic from a manuscript supplied by Erasmus, consisting of detached copies made by various friends without his authority or sancjeon. His own opinion of their merits is thus given in one of his episites to Erasmus:

"I was never much delighted with my Epigrams, as you are well aware; and, if they had not pleased yourself and certain others better than they pleased me, the volume could never have been published."—Lan Caspezii. Life of More. Landcharchurs,—An

"It will be difficult to point out any man like More since the death of Houthius, the last eage of the anotent world. He was and first Englishman who signalized himself as an orator, the first writer of a prose which is still intelligible, and the first who wrote the history of his country in its present language." - See Janua

If ever there was a man who bore about with him a living verification of the truth of the inspired declaration of the wise man,—"A merry heart doeth good like a medi-cine,"—that mun was Sir Thomas More. And this merry citie, —that min was off inoman More. And the merry heart was imporvious to all "the sling and arrows of outrageous fortune:" many waters of affliction could not quench the fervid fire of his animal spirits; disgrace and penury, the frown of his sovereign, the chill damp of his dungeon, the axe and the executioner, and even the immediate proximity of the grim King of Terrors, could not for one moment daunt his unconquerable soul. possession of his prison as if it were his chosen habitation, jested with his jailer until stern authority relaxed into good-humour, and cracked three of the best jokes on re-cord when standing on the very scaffold. But he had something more substantial than his wit to sustain him in someting more substantial than his wit to mistan him in that trying hour: he was "a good man and a hely," a firm believer in the great truths of Christianity, and reposed an unwavering confidence in the promises of the gospel. The horrid crime by which this illustrious Englishman was thus burried from the world by a remorsoless tyrant was lamented at home with "deep but ellent sorrow, in foreign

Nor was this righteous indignation restricted to men of virtue and letters in the ranks of private and public life; the King of France expressed his horror and disgust in terms which excited the ire of the English Nero; and the Emperor Charles V., on the receipt of the startling intelli-gence, despatched a messenger to summon Sir Thomas Elliot, the English ambassador, to his presence, and made that minister blush for his country before the imperial courtiers, whilst their sovereign catechized him in no courfiers, whilst their sovereign cateenized mm in megentic language;

""My lord embassador," exclaimed the emperor, "we understand that the king your master has put to death his faithful servant and grave and wise counsellor, Sir Thomas More. Killot, abashed, made answer that he understood nothing thereof. "Well," said the emperor, it is too true; and thus we will say, that if we had been master of such a servant, of whose abilities ourself have had these many years no amall experience, we would rather have lost the best city in our dominious than so worthy a counsellor."

Such was the language of the emperor, as related by Sir Thomas Klliot himself, on his return to Emgland, to More's

Thomas Elliot himself, on his return to England, to More daughter and his son-in-law. See Roper's Life of Sir Thomas More.

Sir Thomas More was "taken from the evil to come" on for Thomas more was "taken from the evil to come" on the 6th day of July, 1535; and in one year and six months from that date he was followed to the grave by his friend of many years, Desiderius Eraemus. We are told that love which commences early and grows rapidly is not likely to thrive; but it was not so with these great men. He whose hand and heart sketched for the admiration of Huttenus the glowing portrait of "England's High-Chan-cellor," in the maturity of his honours and of his ripened intellect, was the same who demanded respecting the thoughtful student of seventeen summers,

"Thoms: Mori ingenio quid unquam finati natura vel mollius, vel dulcius, vel felicius?"—Epist. XIV. Vida Des. Brasmi Epistoles, Lugduni Batavorum, 1703, tom. tertius, Op. Ersam. Clerici.

So truly were these friends united, that, when Erasmus bowed his head under the sad news of More's cruel death, he exclaimed, in the bitterness of his soul,
"In More milit videor extinctus."

We have seen that this prophecy soon indeed proved a

An account of "the unparalleled achieve-ments" of Sir Henry Morgan will be found in The History of the Bucenneers of America, made English from the Dutch Copy written by J. Esquemeling, one of the Buccaucers, Lon., 1684, 4to. This book, especially when it has the 4th part, (the voyage of Captain Sharp in the South Sea,) and all the plates, maps, &c., is very sparce, The collector of American history, however, must not fail to secure it.

the daughter of a performer at the Royal Theatre who somewhere between 1770 and '86,—so widely do those differ in their dates who have ventured to dogmatize upon so delicate a subject. As Mr. Owenson relieved his professional duties by composing poetry and music, a taste for these accomplishments was early developed in one of the brightest of children; and by the time Miss Sydney had celebrated her fourteenth birthday she gave to the world a volume of Poems,-of about, we presume, the average excellence pertaining to that mature period of life. Those who have once gained or fancied they have gained the ear of "a discerning public" are seldem disposed to hastily relinquish the hydra-headed auditor; and, after the lapse of a few years partially occupied in the acquisition of "such stuff as" novels "are made of,"—we mean no disrespect by this application,—the aid of the printers was again invoked, and, for many years, volumes were poured forth with a profusion which argued a rare facility in the art of composition, combined with considerable eleverness in portraiture, and a happy knack of hitting off the whim-sical peculiarities of the people of "Ould Iroland" which delighted her numerous readers. The remarkable success of The Wild Irish Girl, in particular, introduced Miss Owenson to the fashionable circles of society; and a visit to the Marquis of Abercorn at his seat, Baron's Court, county of Tyrone, resulted, in 1812, in her marriage to Sir Thomas Charles Morgan, M.D., who died in 1843, (2004). After her marriago Lady Morgan spent, at different times, a number of years on the Continent, and has proved by her graphic sketches of France (see Nos. 11, 16) and Italy (No. 12) that she travelled with her eyes and ears both open. She has been no loser by her efforts to amuse and instruct the public: the profits of her various works having been estimated—whether correctly or not works having been estimated—whether correctly or not we knew not—at not less than £25,000. The late Lady Clurks was sister to Lady Morgan. During the ministry of Lori Grey, a pension from the Civil List of £300 was sonferred upon Lady Morgan as an acknowledgment of her services to the Republic of Letters. Her publications have appeared in the following order: 1. A volume of Poems, (ante.) 2. St. Clair, or The Heiress of Desmond; a Novel, 1884, 2 vols. 12mo. S. Lady Morgan responds to these strictures, with considerable spirit, in the Preface to her France, 1817, (q. v.;) and the reviewer answers, in no gentle terms, in the sweep-ing charge on that work in vol. xvii. 260–286. (See No. 11,

This work is the result of Lady 8vo; 4th ed., 2 vols. 8vo. This work is the result of Lady Morgan's visit to France in 1816-17. The Quarterly Reviewer considers that the writer's opportunities of observation were too limited to justify the comprehensive title France,-remarking,

"One merit, however, the title has: it is appropriate to the volume which it introduces; for to falsehood it adds the other qualities of the work,—vagueness, bombast, and affectation. This does not surprise us, and will not surprise our readers when they are told that Lady Morgan is no other than the ci-devent Miss Owenson, the author of those tomes of absurdity—those puzzles in three volumes—called Ida of Athens, The Missionary, The Wild Irish Gul, and that still wilder rhapsody of nonsense, O'Donel."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xvii. 260-261.

This reviewer proceeds to charge France, omitting minor

"Bad taste, bombast and nonsense, blunders, ignorance of the French language and manners, general ignorance, Jacobinism, falsehood, licentiousness, and implety. These, we admit, are no light accusations of the work; but we undertake, as we have said, to prove them from Lady Morgan's own mouth."

About twenty pages are occupied with the citation of evidence in proof of this heavy indictment, which it is easy to see is from the delicate pen of the amiable difford, the executioner of Ida of Athens, (see No. 7, ante,)—although we have seen it credited to Mr. Croker. This "swashing blow" was one of the critical offences which roused the ire of Serjeant Talfourd against one of the most ferocious fere nature, (see our Life of John Krats, p. 1010

"Who will not hall with Joy a new volume from Lady Morgan? Her bright and clastic pen has too long lain still: readers who remember how it touched the story of the Sacred Chair, as sold by a living cardinal, will rejoice to hear that it is again moving into light. The work now preparing for the press bears the title, 'An Old Volume,' is, we believe, the herself of long-centemplated memoirs of her own times, and deals with the literary and social aspects of France during the crashing years of Bourbon rule. Events which M. Guizet coldly describes on the surface, Lady Morgan, it is said, warmly lays bare at the heart. Such a volume will have thousands of readers."—May, 1888.

Morris, Captain Charles, d. 1838, at Brockham Lodge, Dorking, in his 93d year, served in the British army during the American Revolution, in the 17th Regiment of Foot; on his return to England he exchanged to a dragoon-regiment, and subsequently entered the Life-Guards. He married the widow of Sir William Stanhope. He was a great favourite in fashionable society, for the amusement of which he wrote many bacchanalian songs and uttered many witty sayings. After his death appeared Lyra Urbanica, or The Social Effusions of the celebrated Captain Charles Morris, of the late Life-Guards, Lon., 2 vols. Svo. Again, 1844, 2 vols. Svo. Neither the captain nor many of his fashionable friends were at all "Puritanical" in their standard of convivial poetry, and many of Morris's sougs were decidedly free; but the critic of Blackwood asserts that in this collection of his verses "he has not given a syllable to the public which the most refined delicacy could wish expunged."—Jan. 1841, 47-55, q. v. Captain Morris's widow seems to have rated his productions highly, for she named £10,000 to Murray as the price of the MSS., (supra;) but we imagine that she had to be satisfied with much less. It will not give the disciples of Father Mathew (among whom we are proud to be classed) a very favourable opinion of Morris's choice of subjects when we tell them that Morris's best song is called "The Toper's Apology." Referring to the third and fifth verses of this song, Moore remarks,

"Assurelly, had Morris written much that at all approached the following verses of his 'Reasons for Drinking,' few would have equalled him either in fancy or in that lighter kind of pathos which comes, as in this instance, like a few melancholy notes in the middle of a gay air, throwing a soft and passing shade over mirth'

Morris perpetuated the follies of youth to the extreme limits of old age,-not without remorse; for his farewell song to the Becfsteak Club, written in his eighty-sixth year, might readily be accepted as a poetical paraphrase of the Vanity of Vanities of the wisest of men. The title of this touching threnody is "Friends all Gone." We extract a few lines:

"The mind, on itself wholly cast, Still fearfully traces its course, And, alas I ever finds in the past Sure cause of regret and remore

"Then grievous it is for the mind To dive midst its errors in vain, For the present no solace to find, For the future no hope to retain."

Surely it is an unprofitable service which has no better rewards than these for its votaries!

Afraja has been warmly commended by the London Athenaum, Spectator, Leader, and other periodicals. We are glad to be able to states that Mr. Morris has made a translation from the German of Mügge's very successful novel of Erick Randal, (pub. in 1855,) which relates to the period when Finland because a Russian province. the work would find a competent translator.
"Here is a book," remarks the first-named periodical, "which,

"It is our hope," says the London Quarterly, "that the work of Mr. Gregorovius may obtain the compliment of translation, which we think it deserves."

Mr. Morris's translation has been pronounced "excellent and faithful."

"The style in which Mr. Morris has done this work." remarks the North American Raview, "leads us to hope well for the original work on Naples which he is now preparing."—July, 1855, 276.

Gregorovius's work has also been translated into English by another hand: see Martineau, Russell. In addition to the literary labours above noticed, Mr. Morris has nearly or quite ready for publication a translation from the German of Prof. J. G. Müller's History of the Primitive Religions of the Indian Races of the American Continent and the West India Islands, with a View of their Political and Social Condition; with Notes and Observations by the translator. So soon as Mr. Morris can secure a respite from his political duties and relieve the toils of law-making by the pleasures of book-making,—for "the labour we delight in physicks pain,"—we hope to welcome from his hands some important original contribution to the literature of his country.

1838, 8vo, pp. 365. So far our biographical duties have been sufficiently easy, a mere enumeration of deeds, dates, and editions; but when we come to the critical portion of this article we find ourselves grievously afflicted with the embarras de rickesses. A host of enthusiastic admirers, who have struck their lyres, nibbed their pens, or tuned their voices in no measured plaudits of Morris's lyrics, confront us by their mute but appealing representatives,-the volumes which stare us in the face, -and insist upon our chronicling their tributes in this our biographical sketch of the great "song-writer of America." The thing is plainly impossi-ble: all that can be done in the limited space to which we are confined is the presentation of a brief catalogue of the best-known of our author's songs and the citation of a few lines of testimony to his poetical genius. Firstly, then, the catalogue should run somewhat on this wise: 1. Woodman, Spare that Tree; 2. My Mother's Bible; 3. We were Boys Together; 4. The Ministure; 5. Where Hudson's Wave; 6. Land Ho! 7. The Pastor's Daughter; 8. Life in the West; 9. Oh, a Merry Life does the Hunter Lead; When other Friends are round Thee; 11. A Legend of the Mohawk; 12. Poetry; 13. I'm with You once again, my Friends; 14. Near the Lake; 15. The Chieffain's Daughter; 16. Woman; 17. Long Time Age; 18. I Love the Night; 19. Oh, Think of Mu; 20. The Star of Life: 21. The Season of Love; 22. I never have been False to Thee; 23. The Rock of the Pilgrims; 24. Indian Songs; 25. A Rock in the Wilderness; 26. The new the Promised Hour; 27. The Bacchanal; 28. The Dismissal; 29. Lines after the Manner of the Olden Time; 30. Roscabel; 31. The Carrier Dove; 32. The Croton Ode; 33. The Western Refrain; 34. Mary, the Heart that Owns thy Tyrant Sway; 35. Think of Me, my Own Beloved; 36. One Balmy Summer Night; 37. When I was in my Teens.

Our first quotation shall be for the especial benefit of the many fair vocalists who have been in the habit, for a longer period than some of them are willing to admit, of charming their evening parties with the witchery of their wn melodious voices fittingly employed as the vehicles of Morris's poetical genius:

Morris's poetical genius:

"We know of none who have written more charmingly of love than George Morris. Would to Apollo that our rhymesters would condescend to read carefully his poetical effusions! ... Let the reader mark the surpassing excellence of the love-songs,—their perfect naturalness, the quiet beauty of the similes, the fine blending of graceful thought and tendor feeling which characterize them. Morris is indeed the poet of home-joys. None have described more elequently the beauty and dignity of true affection, of puscion based upon estoem; and his fame is certain to endure while the Anglo-Basses woman has a hearth-stone over which to repeat her nost othertished household words. .. Morris has never attempted to robe vice in beauty; and, as has been well remarked, his lays can bring to the cheek of purity no blush save that of pleasure."—

But there must be an end to quotations. We have by no means satisfied those who would record their eulogies:

Grim Griswold's ghost complains that we are slow, And Morris's "shade" walks unappeased before us.

But the reader must lay the first by referring to the Poets and Poetry of America, and do justice to the latter (the brigadier's old and tried friend, N. P. Willis) by perusing his cloquent letter on Morris published some years since in Graham's Magazine. Room or no room, we are unwilling to close this article without a few lines from the latter:

He is just what poets would be if they sang, like birds, without citicism; and it is a peculiarity of his fame that it seems as regardless of criticism as a bird in the air. Nothing can stop a song of his. It is very easy to say that they are easy to do. They have a momentum, somehow, that it is difficult for others to give, and that speeds them to the far goal of popularity,—the best proof consisting in the fact that he can at any moment get fifty dollars for a song unread, when the whole remainder of the American Parnasus could not sell one to the same buyer for a shilling."

810 Morris, Robert, in 1857 retired from the editorial chair of the Ponnsylvania Inquirer and Courier, of Philadelphia, (see Harding, Jespen, ante,) the duties of which he had discharged almost from boyhood, and became President of the Bank of the Commonwealth, in that city. Mr. Morrie's moral essays and political disquisitions would, if collected, fill several large volumes; and few authors could review so large a mass of their lucubrations with less self-represent. Amids the political warfare of more than a quarter of a century, Mr. Morris maintained an enviable reputation for courtesy, candour, and an intelligent devotion to the public interests which he felt it his daty to espouse. A specimen of his postical talents—The Broken-Hearted—will be found in The Philadelphia Book,

*There is perhaps no Masonic book on this continent, says our ordinary Monitors, which has had so large a circulation as this. Brother Morris is the great Masonic Dickens of America; and, from his extensive travel and close observations, be has been able to supply his ready pen with facts of the most important factoret to the craft. No Mason should be without the Lights and Shadows."

The facts and data upon which these researches were based were collected with almost incredible indoor, and at an expense which few students could afford, or, affording, would have consented to incur... Dr. Morton was essentially a man of no theories: he brought to the service of ecience an earnest love of truth in its simplest and severest form, and was always ready to yield his opinions to the rigid requirement of facts... He had, in short, a true appreciation of the dignity and aims of science."

"My own copy" was one of the edition published by our friend Fields, of Boston; and we have already seen on a former page (595) of this Dictionary that Miss Mitford liked the poet-publisher at least as well as she liked his books.

Among Motherwell's best-known poems are Jeanie Mor-rison; My Heid is like to Rend, Willie; The Battle-Flag of Sigurd; The Parting; The Voice of Love; A'Scottish Summer Noon; May Morn Song; They Come! the Merry Summer Mouths; The Demon Lady; The Madman's Love; The Midnight Wind; The Sword Chaunt of Thorstein Raudi; A Steede! a Steede of Matchless Speede, (really by Motherwell, though ascribed by him in his Minstreley to Lovelace.)

"When Aaron's roal sprang out and budded, those who saw it could not marvel more at the dry timber producing leaf and bloom than we did when Motherwell, an acute and facitions antiquarian, appeared as a poet, original and vigorous. His lyrics are forceful and flowing.—with more of the strength of Burns than of bis simplicity and passion."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crat. Hist. of the Last Fifty Fears, 1833.

"He was about equally successful in two departments,—the martial and the plaintive; yet, stirring as are his "Sword Chaunt of Thorstoin Baudi' and his "Battlo-Fig of Sigurd," I doubt much whether they are entitled to the same praise or have gained the same deserved acceptance as his "Jeanie Morrison" or his striking stanzas commencing "My Heid is like to Rend! . . . Several of his lyrics also verge on excellence; but it must be acknowledged of his poetry generally that ingenious although it he, it rather excites expectation than fairly satisfies"—Moir's Sketches of the Pact. Ed. of the Pact Holf-Chaury, 1851, 243-244.

"All his perceptions are clear, for all his senses are sound: he has fine and strong sensibilities and a powerful Intellect. . . . Prior to this creditable expatriation, he had contributed to the literature of his country two novels,—Morton's Hope, or The Memoirs of a Provincial, 1839; and Merry Monut, A Romance of the Massachusetts Colony. These works, "willingly" or unwillingly, were permitted to "dio;" and, had Mr. Motley there are the gray group will in direct here will be a superfection of the contribution of the cont would have ended. But, in a nobler spirit, the youthful author only changed his department of labour: he knew that if he "could not fiddle" he could do something betters and, in the spirit of the general of old, he determined to and, in the spirit of the general of our in electronica we make of a little village a great city,—i.e. to substitute, for the unsatisfactory scraps of scattered knowledge we pussessed on a most important subject, a symmetrical "history of the great agony through which the Republic of Holland was ushered into life." But few young scholars would have "rison to the height of this great argument" or even the self-proposition of such a task; and still fewer would have remained young scholars by the time they had reached the goal. But by the end of the year 1855haps somewhat earlier-Mr. Motley had erected from the haps somewhat earlier—Mr. Molley had erected from the materials dispersed throughout the works of Bor, Meteron, De Thou, Burgundius, Heuterus, Tassis, Vigilius, Hoofd, Haraeus, Van der Haer, Grotius, Van der Vynckt, Wagenaer, Van Wyn, De Jonghe, Kluit, Van Kampen, Dewos, Kappelle, Bakhuysen, Groen van Prinsterer, Ranke, Raumer, Mendoza, Carnero, Cabrera, Herrera, Ulloa, Bentivoglio, Peres, Strada,—together with MS. state-papera, letters, &c.,—a historical monument which will outlast two-thirds of the nevels of the present and past generations. His History, prefaced by a succinct Historical Introduction of 92 pages, embraces the period from the troduction of 92 pages, embraces the period from the abdication of Charles V. in 1555 to the death of William abuncation of Charles v. in 1555 to the death of William the Silent, Prince of Orange, in 1584. In the introduction of this work to the public, Mr. Motley enjoyed a rare advantage. Mr. Prescott, in the Preface to vol. i, of his History of the Reign of Philip the Second, remarked that

"The Revolution of the Netherlands, although, strictly speaking, only an episode to the main body of the narrative, from its importance well deserves to be treated in a separate and independent narrative by itself."

He adds, in a note,

"It is gratifying to learn that before long such a history may be expected—if, indeed, it should not appear before the publication of this work—from the pen of our accomplished countryman, Mr. J. Lothrop Molley, who during the last few years, for the better presentation of his labors, has established his residence in the neighborhood of the scenes of his narrative. No one acquainted with the fine powers of mind possessed by this scholar and the carnestness with which he has devoted himself to his task can doubt that he will do full justice to his important but difficult subject."—xil. Thus heralded, it is no marvel that when Mr. Motley put his book to press (1856, 3 vols, 8vo, London and New York) it was perused with no ordinary interest on both sides of the Atlantic, and conspicuously noticed by the literary periodicals of all grades, from the daily sheet to

"A serious chasm in English historical literature," observes the Westminster Review for April, 1856, "has been very remarkably filled.... A history, then, as complete as industry and gentus can make it, new lios before us, of the lirst twenty years of the revolt of the United Provinces.—of the period in which these provinces finally conquered their independence and established the Republic of Rolland... All the essentials of a great writer Mr. Motley eminently possesses. His mind is broad, his industry unwearled. In power of dramatic description no nodern historian, except perhaps Mr. Carlyle, surpasses him; and in analysis of character he is elaborate and distinct... We believe that we may prunise him as warm a welcome among ourselves as he will receive even in America, that his place will be at once conceded to him among the first historians in our common language."

The Dutch Republic was commended by the following London journals,—perhaps by many more: The Athen-som, The Non-Conformist, The Globe, The Leader. The Saturday Review, The Press, The Times, The Daily News, and The Examiner.

bistory, we must not omit to say, is very warm of heart: he is a stout republican, tyrannical in judgment against tyranny, and having no tolerance at all for the intelerant."

At home Mr. Motley's work was received with enthusiastic applause. The critic of the North American Review for July, 1856, (Francis W. Palfrey,) devotes no less than thirty-five pages to an examination of the book, concluding with the remark.

"We close the story of his [William's] life with the conviction that Mr. Motley's History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic is a most valuable contribution to history and letters, a work in every way worthy of its majestic theme, and one that every American may be proud to own as written by his countryman."—217.

Mr. N. P. Willis, in a letter descriptive of a visit to Washington Irving at Sunnyside in August, 1857, ob-

"Motley's 'Dutch Republic' lay open on the table, [in Irving's Library, and Irving said he had been employing a little vacation from his own labors in the reading of it. It had interested him exceedingly. 'How surprising (he exclaimed, quite energetically) 'that so young a man should jump at once, full grown, to fame, with a big book, so well studied and complete!"

Our valued friend Dr. Francis Lieber, late of the College of South Carolina, now of Columbia College, New York, writes us, under date of 14th April, 1857.

"I hope you will say something very substantial about Motley's History of the Dutch Republic. I am just finishing it. . . It is a book which deserves a few most substantial lines in your com-prehensive work."

We desired this learned critic to give us his opinion of prehensive work."

We desired this learned critic to give us his opinion of the work in writing. His response was as follows:

"For twenty years I have been in the habit of urging the students to study the history of the Netherlands, as next in importance among modern states to the history of our own country with that of England; repeatedly I have advised them to take solitary William of Uningo as a great theme for addresses or essays; and you may readily judge with what satisfaction I can now direct them to footby's work. One or two things I could have wished differently; but the merits of the book are so great and of such general and public character that all of us own thanks to the patient, diligent, skilful, right-minded, and truthful author. It is a wholesome and nutritions book. It is a good pubulum for commonwealth-men and commonwealth-lads. I know that it is but too often injurious to become acquainted with crime and vice, even when exhibited to be loathed; but it is a stern necessity for reflecting men of action to know how deep humanity can sink and what fearful capacity of relapse there is in every one of us in be-wildering circumstances. Besides, the baseness of Philip and the crime of Alva are so atnendous that they lose the power of familiaring the souls of men, when plainly represented, with baseness and crime; while side by side with these hideous picture is exhibited the full-length image of William.—the greatest of that worshipfal band of exalted citizens to which Thrasybulus, Timoleon, Andress Doria, and Washington belong. Congress and Parliament decree theaks for military exploits,—rarely for diplomatic achievements. If they over voted their thanks for books.—and what deeds have influenced the course of human events more than some books—Mottoy ought to have the thanks of our Congress; isset I doubt not that he has already the thanks of every American who has read the work. It will leave its distinct mark on the Amontona mind."—New York, April 19, 1857.

Mr. Evenett writes us, under date of 7th June, 1858, "Mr. Moticy's Ristory of the Dutch Republic is, in my judgment, a work of the highest morit. Unwearying research for years in the libraries of Europe, patience and judgment in arranging and diseating his materials, a fan historical tack, much skill in characterization, the purspective of narration, as it may be called, and a vigorious style, make for make it a very capital work, and place the mans of slotley by the side of those of our great American historical tria.—Barcroft, Irving, and Pressott. I mane them alpha-

It would hardly be justice to Mr. Motley and to our readers to omit the publication of a letter from an eminent historian just named, whose researches have led him into the same fields of historical investigation which Mrs. Motley has the credit of having cultivated to such advantage:

"Alluding to a prediction which I had ventured in regard to Modley's 'Rise of the Dutch Republic' a little while before its publication, you ask me if the results have corresponded with my

"However this may be, I can honeatly bear my testimony to the extent of his researches and to the accuracy with which he has given the results of them to the public.

"Far from making his book a mere register of events, he has penetrated deep below the surface and explored the causes of these events. He has carefully studied the physiognomy of the times and given finished portraits of the great men who conducted the march of the revolution. Every page is instinct with the love of freedom and with that personal knowledge of the working of free institutions which could alone enable him to do justice to his subject. To these commendations of Mr. Motley's countrymen, we can add those of the reviewers of his work in the following periodicals, (and the list could be increased:) Christian Examiner, Method. Quar. The bibliographical history of the work for the short time it has been before the world (we write in March, 1858) runs thus: a new edition, revised by the author, (uniform with the English eds. of Macaulay's History of England and Prescott's works,) was pub. in London (where the sale has reached 15,000 copies) in November, 1857; a new Amer. ed. is now in press in New a reprint was pub. in Amsterdam and had a rapid sale; a translation of the work into German has been pub. at Leipsig and Dresden; a translation into Dutch has been made under the supervision of the learned critic and historian, M. Bakhuyzen van den Brinck, Chief Archivist of the Netherlands. He contributes an introductory chapter of a very complimentary character and many annota-tions. The work was pub. in numbers. A commendatory review, by one of the best historical writers of Holland, appeared in the Gids, the leading review of the country.
The unfinished translation into French, under the superthe unmined translation into French, under the super-vision of M. Guizot, has been already noticed. These translations and reviews have been all spontaneous,— without the agency of the author, who, "forgetting the things that are behind," has again buried himself up to his eyes (at the Hague) in huge felies and musty MSS., diligently engaged in preparing a continuation of the history of his idelized Dutch Republic. Long may this worthy modern scion of the venerated Diedrich Knickerbocker live to write of ancient Dutchmen and to enjoy the fruit of his learned labours!

Moxon, Charles. Introduc. to Mineralogy, Lon., 1339, 8vo.

Moxon, Edward, a well-known London publisher, deservedly commended for the excellent style in which he "gets up" the works of Shakspeare, Dryden, Jonson, Chaucer, Spenser, Wordsworth, Campbell, Talfourd, Tennyson, Hunt, Browning, Lamb, and other authors, pub. in early life a poem called Christmas, which was praised by Rogers and in 1837 a volume of Sonnets, which were not praised and in 1837 a volume of connets, which were not praised by Croker.

"The necessity of obtaining the 'imprimatur' of a publisher," remarks the reviewer, in conclusion, "Is a very wholesome restraint, from which Mr. Moxon—muluckily for himself and for us—found himself relieved. If he could have looked at his own work with the impartiality, and perhaps the good taste, that he would have exercised on that of a stranger, he would have saved himself a good dead of expense and vexation, and me should have been apared the pointul necessity of contrasting the ambitious pretensions of his volume with its very moderate literary merit."—Lon. Ourr. Esp., liv., 209–217. Quar. Rev., liv. 209-217.

Dr. Griswold, however, after oulogizing in ardent strains Mr. Moxon's excellent traits of personal character and his taste as a bibliopolist, avers that as a poet he may, on the score of his own merits, stand 'unbonneted' among his brothren, [the sons of the Muses,]" and quotes "from the edition of his poems published in 1843" several specimens of Mr. Moxon's art in "building the lofty rhyme." See Griswold's Poets and Poetry of England, 1854, 357.

Since the above was written, Mr. Moxon has left the scene of his earthly labours: he died in June, 1858. Moxon numbered in his wide circle of friends Madame D'Arblay, the elder Disraeli, Charles Lamb, (who be-queathed to him his curious collection of books.) Samuel Rogers, Barry Cornwall, J. Sheridan Knowles, R. Monck-ton Milnes, John Forster, and Tempson. We presume that a detailed biographical sketch of one so widely known and generally esteemed will appear in an early number

3. Catechismus Paulinus in usum Scholice Pauline conscriptus, &c., 1601, 8vo. In long and short verse, and once in great repute. In his liberal use of the red, Mul caster was a worthy disciple of his old master, Nicholas Udall; and we may add that both were closely followed by Richard Busby, (see p. 308, ante.) When Mulcaster had made up his mind that a boy would be the better for a flagellation, and had lifted his dreadful rod, the inter-

a fisgellation, and had lifted bis dreadful rod, the intercession of home authority seems to have been of no benefit to the trembling culprit. Fuller tells us,

"His method in teaching was this: In a morning he would exactly and plainly construe and parse the lessons of his scholars; which done, he slept his hour (custom made him critical to proportion it) in his desk, [a rather small bedroom, we should imagine!] in the school; but woe be to the scholar that slept the while! Awaking, he heard them accurately; and Atropos might be persuaded to pity as soon as he to pardon where he found just fault. The prayers of cockering mothers prevailed with him as much as the requests of indulgent fathers,—rather increasing than nitigating his severity on their offending child."—Fuller's Worthes, ed. 1840, iti. 308. mitigating his se-

Muller, Max, Oriental scholar, son of Wilhelm Müller the post, burn at Dessau, Dec. 6, 1823. Though born and educated in Germany, Müller has written most of his works in English; and since 1850 he has held a Professorship in the University of Oxford. He was sent to school at Leipzig, and matriculated at the University there section at Leipzig, and matriculated at the University there in 1841. He devoted himself at first to classical philology, was admitted a member of G. Herman's Seminary, and took his degree in 1843. He then gave himself entirely to Oriental studies, and chiefly to Sanekrit, which he began under Professor Brockhaus at Leipzig. In 1844 he published his translation of the Hitopadesa, a collection of Indian fables, (Brockhaus, Leipzig:) and he afterwards went to Berlin to hear the lectures of Bopp, Rückert, and Scholling. In 1845, he went to Paris, where he attended Burnouf's lectures at the Collège de France, and began to collect materials for an edition of the Rig-Veds, the sacred songs of the Brahmans, together with the voluminous commentary of Saganadranja. In order to carry out this work, he proceeded to England in 1846, and, on the recommendation of Professor II. II. Wilson, he was commissioned by the East India Company to publish his edition of the Rig-Veda in England and at their expense. The first volume appeared in 1849, 4to, (Allen, London.) the second in 1853; the third was advertised for 1856. The whole work will consist of six volumes. Müller took up his abode at Oxford in 1848. In 1850, the University appointed him Deputy Professor, and in 1854 Taylorisa Professor, of Modern European Languages and Literature, giving him at the same time the honorary degree of Master of Arts. In 1849, the French Academy gave him the prize, Volney, for his Essay Ou the Comparative Philology of the Indo-European Languages in its Bearing on the Early Civilization of Mankind, (written in English, but not yet published;) and in 1851 he was elected a Follow of the Bavarian Academy. Besides a German translation of the Meghaduta, (Samtor, Königsberg, 1847.) and several contributions to scientific journals in Germany, we have to mention his article on Comparative Philology, (Edinburgh Review, Oct. 1851;) his Letter to Chevalier Bunson on the Classification of the Turanian Languages, in Bunsen's Philosophy of Universal History, vol. i. pp. 263-521; his Essay on the Voda and Zendavesta, ibid. An Essay on the Relation of Bengali to the Aryan and Aboriginal Languages of India is printed in the Report of the British Association in 1847. In 1854, he published his Suggestions for Officers learning the Languages of the Seat of War in the East, 8vo, (London, Longman,) of which a second edition was published in 1855, under the title of Survey of Languages, 8vo, (Williams & Norgate, London.) He also pub., in the same year, Proposals for a Missionary Alphabet, 8vo, and table, fol., (Williams & Norgate, London.) In the Oxford Essays of 1856, Miller has published an Essay on Comparative Mythology, establishing a new theory of the origin of mythological language. We see advertised by the same author an edition of the Rig-Veda, with notes and translation, (Brockhaus, Leipzig.) and a Chronological Reading-Book of German Literature, (Longman, London.) See METCALPE, Rev. Frederick. In 1857, he published Buddhism and Buddhist Pilgrims,—a review of M. Stanislaus Julien's "Voyages des Pèterins Bouddhistes;" reprinted, with Additions, from the Times of April 17 and 20, [1857,] together with a Letter on the Original Meaning of "Nervana," 8vo, pp. 521.

"John Halifax is a very good, interesting novel. It is designed to trace the causer from buyhood to age of a perfect man,—a Christian gentleman; and it abounds in incident both well and highly wrought. Throughout it is conceived in a high spirit and written with great ability,—better than any former work of its deservedly-successful author."—Lon. Examener.

Mure, Sir William, of Rowallan, in the county of Ayr, 1594?-1657, a poet of some reputation, was actively ongaged in opposition to Charles I, and was wounded in the battle of Long Marston Moor. Most of his composithe battle of Long Marston Moor. Most of his composi-tions remain in MS. Among the best-known of those which were given to the world are a trans. in English Sapphies of Boyd of Trochrig's Latin poom Hecatombe Supplies of Boyd of Troching's Latin poem Hecatomoe Christiana, 1628; and his Trve Crucifixe for Trve Catholicks. Some of his poems will be found in Lyle's Ancient Ballads and Songs, Lon., 1827, 8vo, (see p. 1148, ants.) where there is also a biographical notice of the

Mure, Colonel William, M.P., of Caldwell, we suppose to have reached at this time (1858) the extreme limit of that indefinite period called "middle age;" and our inference is based on the following passage in Moore's

Diary, under date of Nov. 7, 1825:

"A large party to dinner at Joffrey's. Mr. and Mrs. F., . . . a Mr. Mure, a young man only twenty-two, whom Jeffrey mentioned to me as having given great promise of talent and as being the author of some late articles in the 'Review' on Spanish Poetry, &c. &c."—Moore's Memoirs, vol. v., 1858, 11.

After completing his classical studies at a German university, Colonel Mure devoted his leisure hours to a sedulous cultivation of Greek literature; and, about ton years after the day when he was encountered at Jeffrey's dinnerafter the day when he was encountered at Jeffrey's dinnertable by Moore, he had committed to paper a portion of the learned work on this subject the first part of which was not published until fifteen years later, (1850.) In the mean time, we find ascribed to Wm. Mure, Esq., a treatise entitled Brief Remarks on the Chronology of the Egyptian Dynasties, 1829, 8vo, (which we presume to be by our author,) noticed in the London Quarterly Review, zliff, 112; and in 1842 the enthusiastic devotes of the language and literature of Ancient Greece gave to the world a

In 1850, the public were favoured with the first instalment of the results of Col. Mure's long-continued investigations in his chosen department of study,-vols. i., ii., and iii. of A Critical History of the Language and Literature of Antient Greece, from the Earliest Period to the Death of Solon.

"The elaborate work of Colonel Mare," remarks the Edinburgh reviewer, "has the advantage of occupying ground almost untrolden by any English rival, and supplying a deficiency long felt by every classical scholar... The litle of his book sufficiently indicates the particular scope which the author has proposed to himself and the class to which he designs his work to be referred. It is a Critical History of the Language and Literature of Ancient Greece: as such, it is addressed principally to the classical scholar... To the execution of this arduous task Colonel Mure has brought no ordinary qualifications... While we entirely concur with him in rejecting the extreme views of Wolf and his followers. We cannot but think that (independent as he is) he has on some occasions displayed too much deference for the authority of the audient critics... In the able and claborate analysis which Colonel Mure has given of all the leading properties of the Homeric style—by far the most complete and satisfactory review of the saliged which we have ever met with—we for the most part entirely concur. We must however, make a decided exception in regard to what he has termed the 'comic element' of Homer's style."—Edin. Rev. xcii, 393—435.

"Campleting the tribute of universal homage, one of the foremost statemen of our age snatches time from a life of political activity to rear, in praise of Homer, what is almost a cathedral of thought and learning. ... It is not overstaining the merits of the work to say that these 'Studies' form an exhaustice handbook in the field of Homeric inquiry, and, in all points relating to palsezzaic ethnology, chics, religion, politics, and art, open out new and what to us are original views' — Lon. Atten., 1853, 449.

Murphy, Arthur, 1730-1805, a native of Clooniquia, county of Roscommon, Iroland, educated at the College of St. Omer's, after some experience of clerkship in a London banking-house, in 1752 started The Gray's Inn Journal, and henceforth became known as a man of letters of some ability and more industry. From 1762 to '88 he was a barrister; for a short time he tred the boards in the character of Othello, -but had better success in writing plays racter of Othello,—but had better success in writing plays for other people than in enacting the parts already prepared for public presentation. The best-known of his dramatic pieces are: The Upholsterer; a Farce, 1758; The Orphan of China; a Tragedy, 1759; All in the Wrong; a Comedy, 1761: The Citizen; a Farce, 1763; The Grecian Daughter; a Tragedy, 1772; Know Your Own Mind; a Comedy, 1778; and, The Way to Keep Him; a Comedy, 1785. He also gained some credit for several of his other works,—viz.: An Essav on the Life and Genius of Samuel works,-viz.: An Essay on the Life and Genius of Samuel Works,—17. At Jacob and the works of Tacitus, 1793, Johnson, 1792, 8vo; Trans. of the works of Tacitus, 1793, 4 vols. 8vo,—also, 1811, 8 vols. imp. 8vo; The Life of David (larrick, 1801, 2 vols. 8vo; Trans. of the Works of Sallust, 1807, 8vo, [completed by Thomas Moore the poet.] He edited an edition of his own Works,—plays, poems, and miscellaneous writings,—Lon., 1786, 7 vols. 8vo. In his old age he was appointed a Commissioner of Bankrapts, and for the last three years of his life enjoyed an additional pension of £200 per annum. His translation of Tacitus has been commended by a learned critic:

"An excellent work, and supersedes all that has lifther to been done on this author. The lost pertions are supplied by original compositions, and interstitial books are added to connect a so complete the whole."—CLERKS.

Chancellor Kent remarks.

Chancellor Kent remarks,

"The translation wants the compression of the original, and is too periphrastic. The English language would not well admit of the brevity of Tacitus without rendering the narration abrupt sad obscure. The translation is distinguished for elegance at distraight and dignity, and gives the sense of the original with Soldity,"—Oners of Eng. Read., Oakley's ed., 1833. 6.

"Churchill," says Tom Moore, "was not so very far out in saying of Murphy that 'dulness marked him for a mayor.' "Own Mind.] Dashwould's speech shout the M.P.'s ret in his handkerohie's is worthy of Sheridan. Lady Bell an admirable acting part."—Moore's Memoirs, vol. ii., 1853, 283.

"Murphy's plays of 'All in the Wrong's and 'Know Your Own Mind' are admirably written,—with sense, split, and conception of character, but without any great effect of the humorous, or that truth of Seeling which distinguishes the boundary between the absurdities of natural character and the gratuitous fictions of the poet's pen,"—Hazikiz Lecta, on the English Conte Writers, Lock. Murray, Alexander, D.D., 1775-1813, a native of Dunkitterick, Scotland, at an early age displayed so ex-traordinary a zeal for knowledge and power of self-acquisition that Drs. Baird, Finlayson, and Moodie had him-placed at the University of Edinburgh, where he prose-cuted his favourite philological investigations with great success. In 1808, he became assistant to the Rev. Mr. Murhead, minister of Urr, and, after the death of the latter in 1808, succeeded him as full stipendiary of the parish. In 1812, he was elected Professor of Oriental Languages in the University of Edinburgh, and died in the succeeding year. His knowledge of the European and Eastern languages obtained him great reputation : he lived to write only two works on the subject, one a school-book and the other pub. after his death. 1. Outlines of Oriental Philology; comprehending the Grammatical Principles of the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, Arabic, and Abyssinian Languages, 1813. Composed for the use of his students. 2. "From a hasty perusal of the first volume, I find this learned professor studied the European languages with much attention and profit. He has gone further into the origin and formation of languages than any author whose works I have read; and his writings unfold many valuable principles and facts. But he formed a theory which he attempted to support, in my opinion, with little success: at least, in his principles all the usual rules of etymology are transgressed, and all distinction between words of different radical interes is abandened. The author's work presents one of the most singular melleys of truth and error, of sound observation and visionary opinions, that has ever fallon under my notice."—NOAH WESSER: Pref. to his Amer. Murray, Hon. Miss Amelia M., a daughter of Lord George Murray, Bishop of St. David's, who died in 1803, was born about the commencement of the present century. At the age of forty she was chosen Maid of Honour to Queen Victoria, and served in that capacity until a few years since, when she became Lady of the Bed-In 1854 and '55, Miss Murray travelled for Chamber. about fifteen months in the United States, Cuba, and Canada, and favoured Lady Byron (widow of the poet, who celebrates Miss Murray in one of his poems) and other friends with the results of her observations. These epistles were pub. simultaneously in New York and London in 1856, under the title of Letters from the United States, Cubs, and Canada. About 9000 copies of this work were disposed of in the United States in a few months. Certain America led to Miss Murray's retirement from her position as Lady of the Bed-Chamber. See Lon. Athen., Jan. 1856, 197. A notice of Miss Murray's Letters will be found in the periodical just referred to. This notice cannot be called favourable; and an article in the London Critic, written in advance of the publication of the Letters, does not lead the public to anticipate any thing of much value from Miss Murray's pen. The North American Review, July, 1856, 264, and the National Intelligencer, are equally suly, 1930, 203, and the Actions in Complete any more substant sellent respecting any merits which her volume may possess. A complimentary notice of this lady—penned before the appearance of her book (if written after that event perhaps is would have been still more eulogistic—will be found in an article, entitled Some Farther Reminiscences of Cuba, in the Southern Literary Messenger for November, 1855.

Miss Murray has displayed a creditable interest in ranged-achools, female emigration, and other philanthrupic move-ments; and in 1847 she pub. a little work, dedicated to Queen Victoria, entitled Remarks on Education in 1847. This lady is an aunt of the Hon. Charles Augustus Mur-

Murray, Lindley, 1745-1826, a native of Swatara, near Lancaster, Pennsylvania, educated at an academy of the Society of Friends (of which religious body be was a member through life) in the city of Philadelphia, was called to the Bar at the age of twenty-one, and soon afterwards married an estimable female, who survived him; abandoned the law for the counting-house, and, in a few years, retired with a competence; resided for some time on the banks of the Hudson, three miles above New York; in 1784, removed to Holdgate, about a mile from York, England, and there resided until his death. He was a man of enlarged benevelence, practical sense, and well-tempered real. His problecations were as follows: 1. The Power of Religion on the Mind in Retirement, Affliction, and at the Approach of Death, Exemplified in the Testimonies and Experience of Persons distinguished by their Greatness, Learning, or Virtue, N. York, 1787. Anon. Of this excellent work at least eleven eds. have been pub. in America and six in England; last ed., 1845, 18mo. It was trans, into French by L. R. Lafaye, 1802, 12mo. There is a Genera ed., 1823, 2 vols. 8vo.

It is to be observed that this [the Library edition of Murray's Grammar is a very different work from the school-edition, or "Abridgment," and is quite rare. Of the Abridgment the editions both in England and America have been numerous. In America, it has been edited by J. Bacon and others, and "simplified" by A. Fisk. In England, it has been edited by Pinnock, Dr. Giles, and others. Pinnock's last ed. was pub. in 1848, 18mo; and Giles's last impression bears date 1858, 18mo. (We write in March, 1858.) The annual sale of the Abridgment in England has for some years past been about 48,000 to 50,000 copies. Murray's Grammas, therefore, may certainly be called a "popular book." But it is by no means to be supposed that opinion ran universally in its favour. On the contrary, the gravest exceptions have been taken to some of its characteristics by philologers whose consure cannot be safely despised. According to our wont when referring to debatable questions, we shall quote a few opinions on both sides of the subject. These citations, of course, must be few and short; and amplification is the less necessary from the fact of our having already briefly fouched upon Murray's Grammar in our life of Robert Lowth, D.D., p. 1140, caste. guished ancestor, elicited by Mr. Winthrop's enlogy on that truly great man:

"My ancestor," observed his lordship, "lived in the border-time of fable and of truth, when numbers were still half enslaved so necromancy, and when the orb of science was seen darkly through the clouded glass of magical superstitions. Bacon was only begin ning to raise the fabric of knowledge on the foundation of experiment "It is strange that the vigils of a rectame who communed in a foundation strange that the vigils of a rectame who communed in a feundal castle with the then mysterious world of figures and of signs should, after the lapse of near 300 years, be recommending his posterity to the benevolence of an American college. Spath, gentlemen, is the vitality and the protective power of genius. East she now give you a still greater proof of the estimation in which my ancestor has been held on the sull of the United States. I lately had the henour of visiting Mr. Custis, of Arlington, to inspect the relice of Washington. The first object which Mr. Custis exhibited to me was a small engraving, which he said had hung for a length of time at Mount Vernon in the private spartment of the President, and which must have some connection with my name. You may imagine my surprise and gratification when I found that it was the portrait of John Napier, the inventor of logarithms." [Loud applause.]

racter, as may be inferred from the beginning and ending of the last article:

of the last article:

"We observed, towards the close of our first article upon Colossil Napler's History, that to point out all its inaccuracies and appear fully the unjust partialities and systematic misrepresentations by which it is almost everywhere disfigured would require a work more voluminous than itself. The necessity for such a work is, however, daily diminishing; and even before the colonel has finished his undertaking [he had then pub. all but the last volume] he will, we apprehend discover that the sandy foundations on which he has rested his claim to lasting reputation, either as a writer of good taste or as an accurate and judicious historian, have already given way. — We hous, ere long, to resume our exposure of this good taste or as an accurate and inductors instorant, have already given way. . . . We hope, ere long, to resume our exposure of this author's historical and professional blunders; and when we have concluded our examination of his book we may probably give an article (which need not be a long one) to his (so-called) replies."—lxi. 51, 96.

The "so-called replies" appeared in an article prefixed to Napier's 5th vol., (1836,) entitled Answer to some Attacks in the Quarterly Review, The attacks referred to were those pub. in Quarterly Review, lvi. 131-219, 437-489. To his 6th vol. (1840) Napier prefixes some "justificatory pieces," which should be read by all who read the book itself, and especially by those who have read the attacks upon it. The author speaks of his work as one which was "written honestly and in good faith," and at the cost of "sixteen years of incessant labour." We have thus presented a fair view of this controversy; and the reader may amuse the "learned leisure" of months by alternating between the assailants and the admirers of this important chronicle. Among the latter it would not be candid to place the philosophical Coleridge:

"I have been exceedingly impressed," he remarks, "with the evil precedent of Colonel Napier's History of the Peninsular War. It is a specimen of the true French military school: not a thought for the justice of the war; not a consideration of the damnahie and damning injusty of the French invasion. All is looked at as a mere game of exquisite skill, and the praise is regularly awarded to the most successful player. How perfectly ridicalous is the prostration of Napier's mind—apparently a powerful one—before the name of Buonapartel! I declare, I know of no book more likely to undermine the national sense of right and wrong in matters of foreign interference than this work of Napier's."—Tuble-Tuk, 119.

Nash, Richard, 1674-1761, Beau Nash, Master of the Ceremonies at Bath, or King of Bath, was a native of Swansea, Glamorganshire; educated at Jesus College, Oxford; studied law at the Middle Temple, and declined knighthood from King William. Nash, Thomas, 1558-1600 or 1601, the formidable for Martin Marprelate, has been already noticed in our asticle on Gabriel Harvey, to the reforences appended to which we refer the reader for information concerning Mash. See also Dibdin's Lib. Comp.; Biog. Dramat.; Nichole's Lit. Anec. Nash's principal preductions are: 1. A Countercuffe given to Martin Junior, 1589, 4to. 2. with You to Saffron Walden, [Harvey's residence;] or, Gabriel Harvey's Hunt is Vp, 1596, 4to; 6 eds. This pamphlet is supposed to have closed the war between Nash and Harvey. 8. A Pleasant Comedye, called Summer's Last Will and Testament, 1600, 4to. Acted before Q. Elizabeth in 1692. Mash's comedy of the Isle of Doge, for which he was imprisoned was naves and Bandana and Band for which he was imprisoned, was never pub. Pappe with a Hatchet, (e. a., 4to,) it will be noticed, we have attributed to another author: see Litty, Lylie, Lyllie, or LYLY, JOHN. There is a good reason why both Harvey's and Nash's controversial tracts should be very rarely met with; for the quarrel became so "outrageously virulent" that the prelates of Canterbury and London (Whitgift and one presaits of Canterbury and London (Whitgift and Baneroft) in 1599 issued an order "that all Nushe's bookes and Dr. Harvey's bookes be taken whenesoever they may be found, and that none of the said bookes he ever printed hereafter."

Nash himself admits that he had carried his literary

warfares to excess:

"A hundred unfortunate farewels," says he, "to fantasticall satirisme. In these vaines heretofore I misspent my spirit and predigally conspired against good hourse. Nothing is there now so much in my towes as to be at peace with all men and make submissive amends where I have most displeased."—Dedication to Lindy Elizabeth Carry, prefixed to Christes Teares over Jerusalem.

Let all bitter controversialists take warning by this example.

Disraeli remarks of the Haue with You to Saffron Walden,

"Nash, who in his other works writes in a style as flowing as Addison's, with hardly an obsoleto vestige, has rather injured the literary invective by the evident burlesque he affects of 'Harvey's pedantic idiom; and for this Mr. Malone has hastily censured him without recollecting the alm of this modern Lucian."—Miscell. of Lift and 1810, 100

But Malone's condemnation extends much further than the above comment would lead us to suppose

"Of all the writers of the age of Queen Elizabeth," says Malone, "Nashe is the most licentious in his language,—perpetually distorting words from their primitive signification in a manner often purrile and ridiculous, but more frequently incomprehensible and absurd. His prose works, if they were collected together, would perhaps exhibit a greater farrage of unintelligible jargon than is to be found in the productions of any author, ancient or modern."—Survens's Shakep, 1778, Pref., 225.

A famous writer, who was in his boyhood a contemporary of Nash's, referring to the war which the latter waged against the Martin-Marprelate writers, (Penny, Throgmorton, Udal, and Fenner?) remarks that

'Tom Nash appeared against them all, who was a man of sharp wit and the master of a satyricall, merry pen, which he employed to cover the absurdities of those malitions, senseless pannpheta, and sermons as senseless as they: Nash his answers being like his books, which bore these or like titles: 'An Almond for a Parrot,' 'A Fig for my (bod-8-on,' 'Come, Crack me this Nut,' and the like; so that his merry list made some sport, and such a discovery of their absurdities as (which is strange) he put a greater stop to their malicious pamphlots than a much wiser man had been able."—1ZAAK WALTON. -IZAAK WALTON

—IZAAK WALTON.

"Nash," says Disraell, "was a great favourite with the wits of is day. One calls him 'our true Arctine,' another, 'sweet, satyric Nash;' a third describes his muse as 'armed with a gagtooth' (a tuck) and his pen possessed with Herculee's furies. He is well characterised in 'The Return from Parmassus.'

"'His style was witty, the 'he had some gall Something he might have mended.—so may all; Yet this I say, that for a mather's soil.

We quote a few opinions on Neal's Puritans:

"The most distonest book in our language, Dodd's Roman Catholic Church History not excepted."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

"I took it home to my house, and, at breakfast-time, filled the margin quite through,—which I think to be a full contotation of all his false facts and partial representations."—Bissory Warsurson.

"Heylin, in his History of the Presbyterians, blackens them as so many political devite; and Neale, in his History of the Puritans, blanches them into a sweet and almond whiteness."—Disruct's Miscell of Lit., ed. 184f. "" See also 307, 308.

"Neal's History of the Pure. as is almost wholly compiled, as far as this [Elizabeth's] reign is concorned, from Strype, and from a manuscript written by some Puritan about the time. Its was answered by Madox, afterwards Bishop of Worcestor, in a Visdication of the Church of Kngland, published anonymously in 1733. Neal replied with tolerable success; but Madox's book is still a useful corrective. Both, however, were, like most controversalists, prejudiced men, loving the interests of their respective factions better than truth, and not very scrupnious about misrepresenting an adversary. But Neal had got rid of the intolerant spirit of the Euric, tans; while Madox labours to justify every act of Whiteift, and Parker."—Hallam's Constit. Hist. of Eng. 1th ed., 1854, 1266, it.

Neal, John, b. Oct. 25, 1793, at Portland, (then Falmonth.) New England, after some experience of commercial pursuits in Baltimore, applied himself to legal studies and ecame a member of the bar, but has chiefly distinguished himself as a most voluminous contributor to letters,novels, plays, poems, history, and critical reviews with-ent number bearing witness to his indefatigable industry, versatile talent, and ease and sprightliness of style. Commencing authorship by a hydra-headed critique, of sufficient magnitude "to make a small book," on the works of Lord Byron, pub. in The Portico, he soon acquired sufficient courage to essay his first novel, which was given to the world in 1817. The following list of works certainly can-not be denied the morit of variety. We quote some opinions on several of these works by the author himself. opinions on several of these works by the author himself. "A paitry, contemptible affair: my second offering to the public, my first in the shape of a book. . . . Much to the credit of my country, Keep Cool is forgotten, or, where it is known at all, it is looked upou as a disgrace to her literature,—perhaps to myself. I am glad of it."

2. The Battle of Ningara, Goldau the Maniac Harper, and other Poems, by Jehu O'Cataract, 1818; 2d ed., pub. under the name of the author, 1819. 3. Otho; a Tragedy, 1818. Of Nos. 2 and 3 Mr. Neal remarks,

"Works abounding throughout in absurdity, intemperance, affectation, extravagauce,—with continual but involuntary imitation; yet, nevertheless, containing altogether more sincere poetry—more exalted, original, pure, bold, poetry—than all the works of all the other authors that have ever appeared in America. A volume could be collected out of the whole which would contain a many forces that the start poetry are now entry in the works of the start poetry at the start poetry. votume could be collected out of the whole which would contain as much great poetry as any single volume of this age. A few passages are equal to any poetry that ever was written,—to my knowledge. Cry out, if you will; say what you will. What I speak is the truth. It is my honest opinion."

MILLER, JAMES WILLIAM.) In a short time he transferred his periodical, and himself with it, to Boston. At the end of a year it was merged in the New England Galaxy, and Mr. Neal retired to Portland, where he now resides, (1858.) Whilst in England, he lived for some time with Jeremy Bentham, of whom he wrote a Memoir, and trans. from the French of Dumont the famous utilitarian's Principles of Legislation. During this visit Neal contributed largely to Blackwood's Magazine and other British periodicals. He remarks, in a letter before us in answer to our request for information respecting his literary history, at home and abroad, for thirty-six years, among which are The Ladies' Companion, N. England Galaxy, most of the annuals, Blackwood, The Western Review, Colbura's New Monthly, The Exeropean, British and Foreign, Sartain's and Graham's Magazines, and many others not now recollected. I have wholly edited The Telegraph, of Baltimore, and the Brother Jonathan, of New York, and helped edit many others long enough to have them sink or stop. Your plan [of this Dictionary] is excellent; and I hope this answer may serve your turn. It would be quite impossible for me to temember all I have written, even where I have no reason to be ashumed of it,—having published what would amount, I should think, to a hundred octavo volumes at least, on subjects far too numerous to mention."

"John Neal's forces are multitudinous and fire briskly at every thing. They occupy all the provinces of letters, and are nearly uscless from being spread over too much ground."—Whipple's Essays and histories, i. 109: Words.
"I hardly know how to account for the repeated failures of John Neal as regards the construction of his works. His art is great and of a high character, but it is mussive and undetailed. He scens to be either deficient in a sense of completeness or unstable in temperament, so that he becomes wearled with his work before getting it done. . . . I should be inclined to rank John Neal first—or, at all events, second—among our men of indisputable genius."—Poe's Literuti, 1840, 545: Marginalia, CXXXVIII.

"The elements of poetry are poured forth in his verses with a prodigality and power altogether astonishing; but he is deficient in the constructive faculty. He has no just sense of proportion. No one with so rich and abundant materials had ever less skill to use them."—Grissoald's Poets and Poetry of America.

"Neal is a literary and social evergreen of the first quality: except a more silvery tings to his hair and a somewhat thinner cheek, he is the same pleasant, genial, emphate, and colloquial enthusiast as whya he wrote 'Seventy-Six' and the 'American Eagle.' It was a treat to hear him and Dr. J. W. Francis compare notes."—H. T. Tuckerman, May 21, 1868: in a lotter giving an account of Neal's visit to New York in May, 1858.

Neal, Joseph C., 1807-1847, was the son of a gentleman who for some years presided over an academy in Philadelphia and subsequently became minister of a Congregational church in Greenland, New Hampshire, in which town our author was born. After residing for some years in Pottsville, Pennsylvania, the subject of our notice settled, in 1831, in Philadelphia, and assumed the editorial duties connected with The Pennsylvanian, a prominent Democratic journal, and retained this post, with occasional seasons of relaxation in foreign and domestic travel, until seasons or relaxation in foreign and domestic travel, until elicity, when he established Neal's Saturday Gazetta. In 1837, he pub. a selection from his fugitive pieces, under the title of Charcoal Shetches, and, in 1844, gave to the world a vol. entitled Peter Ploddy, and other Oddities. After his death a second series of Charcoal Sketches appeared, pub. by his widow: (see HAVEN, MRS. ALICE B.) This running gallery of eggentric characters of altr. 116. amusing gallery of eccentric characters of city-life was re-ceived with great favour, and has been several times regrinted both in America and England. in the work a congenial vein, and gave substantial proof of his admiration of the artist's pencil.

"The Charceal Eketches and other humorous writings of Joseph C. Nesl," remarks the late Dr. Griswold, "are subborate, but wanting in the grace and spirit which distinguish many productions of this class. Mr. Neal writes as if he had little or no sympathy with his creations, and as if he were a caim spectator of acts and actors, whimsical or comical,—an observer rather by accident than from desire. It is not always so, however, since in some of his sketches he skilbits not only a happy faculty for the burlocque and singular skill in depicting character, but a geniality and hearthness of appreciation which carry the reader's feelings along with his fancy."—

Noetle, Henry, 1793-1828, the son of a London engraver, put an end to his life whilst suffering under a fit of insanity. "The plan of this work is excellent. It consists of a tale—founded either on legendary lore, tradition, or historical fact—for every monarch's reign, from William the Conqueror to Charles the First inclusive. It necessarily follows that there is a great variety both of interest and character. The early monkish superstitions are succeeded by stern chivalry, and chivalry yields in turn to the gradual alteration of national manners, as we descend the stream of time to the latest period. Mr. Neele has bestowed great pains upon his many topics, and displays much ability in his treatment of them."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

Monthly Review for Jan. 1829, 141-154. Of the Lectures on English Part Alexander. lish Poetry the critic remarks.

lish Poetry the critic remarks,
"Though written occasionally with much carelessness, yet we agree with the editor in thinking that they are 'discriminative and eloquent, abounding in well-selected illustration, and inculcating the purest taste.' There are a lew, and but a few, passages in them which were evidently intended for declarantory effect; but the style in which they are generally clothed is clear and well sustained, and the enthusiasm which sometimes breaks out through them affords a decided proof of the author's predilection for the poetle branches of our literature."—Lon. Mr. Nelson is supposed to have been the editor of 5th Modern; and Mr. Wallace thinks it probable that he "may have had an editorial supervision over all the volumes of Modern, giving to some more, and to some loss, of his own labor and stupidity."—Wallowe's Reporters, 233.

Nennius, or Ninnius, Abbot of Bangor, is supposed

by some to have flourished about the beginning of the seventh century; but it is quite uncertain whether such a person ever really flourished at all, or whether the book which bears his name, Historia Britonum, (purporting to have been written in 858!) is the work of some anonymous writer of the twelfth century. The evidences of forgery are too clear to be reasonably denied. A writer in the London Gentleman's Magazine, June, 1857, 710, (Roffensis,) hetrays a sed formance on this subject in his heat to see betrays a sad ignorance on this subject in his haste to correct Dr. Giles's Pref. to his Six Old English Chroniclers, 1847, 12mo: (Nennius is one of the six.) Nennius's Chronicle has already claimed our notice more than once in the nicle has aiready claimed our nonce more man once in one preceding pages: see Gildas; Gunn, Rev. Wm.; Herbert, Hon. He acquired a wide reputation by his graphic tale of Mike Fink, the Last of the Boatmen, pub. in the Western Souvenir for 1829.

"He was a good scholar, a man of genius and taste, a lover of the fine arts, a skilful musician, an i compliabed gentleman, a crastant patron and promoter of letters and the liberal arts. He was one of the chief phoneers of literature in the West,"—Judge Jones Hall, in a Letter to the Author of this Dictionary, Cha., Jun. 15, 1857.

Whilst upon the subject of "the pioneers of Western literature," we must not omit to make honourable mention of John P. Foots, of Cincinnati, President of the Mechanics. Institute and of the Trustees of Ohio Medical College, and formerly editor of the Cincinnati Literary Gazette, e blished in 1824.

"He has spent the greater part of a long and honorable his in the encouragement of letters, learning, and the useful articism in the promotion of benevolent and public splitted enterprises."

"The form in which this work [1802, 8vo] is printed is extremely convenient; so much so that they who can use the Greek may be glad to consult the English octave rather than the unwieldy folio of the archbishop."—Brit. Crit., 0.8., xxil. 437.

"The English [1802, 8vo; 1827, 8vo] furnishes a very convenient book for examining the respective accounts."—Bickersteth's C. S., 1844, 385. See No. 10.

In 1780, 4to, Dr. Joseph Priestly pub. an English version of his Greek Harmony of the Evangelists, and prefixed to it a letter, in which he argued that the duration of our Saviour's ministry was very little, if any, longer than one year; whereas Archbishop Newcome contends that it comprised three years and a half. This view ho that it comprised three years and a half. This view he enforced in (5) The Duration of our Lord's Ministry Particularly Considered; in reply to a Letter from Dr. Priestly on that subject prefixed to his English Harmony of the Evangelists, 1780, 12mo.

"It contains many shrewd and judicious observations on various parts of the gospel history. A reply by Newcome to a second letter from Dr. Priestly appeared the following year."—Orme's Mill. Bib.

This work was indeed printed in 1796, but was not published—circulated —mtil 1299, after the author's death. The author of the Lam of Archbishop Newcome in Chalmers's Biographical Dictionary, zxili. 114, 1815, commits a grave error when he asserts that this translation is the same as the Sociatan version pub. Lon., 1808, 8vo. The title of the latter work might have prevented this missistement: The New Testament in an Improved Version, upon the basis of Archbishop Newcome's new Translation; with a Corrected Text and Notes Critical and Explanatory, &c.

"This version," remarks Dr. Horne, "is avowedly out the modern Socialan scheme: for, though the redly made to say Archbishop Newcone's name is specified in the title-gage as a kind of model, his authority is disregarded whenever it militates against the creed of the anonymous editors. The errors and per-versions of this translation have been most ably exposed. 2c.

O'fine reinarcs of Newcome's version,

"The character of this work has been materially injured by the so-called 'improved Version' of the Unitarians, pretending to be placed on the busis of Archbishop Newcome's.-by which it is

Dr. Newman resided at Birmingham as head of the oratory until 1352, when he was appointed rector of the New Roman Catholic University at Dublin. Of the "Oxford Tract Movement," which was commenced in 1833, Dr. Newman was one of the principal leaders, and may claim nuch of the honour—whatever that may be-which belongs to the organization, and all of the distinction to be awarded to the closing, of this famous series, his last contribution, No. 90, giving so much offence to portion of the ecclesia-tical dignitaries and laity of the church that the Bishop of Oxford requested a discontiuuance of these publications. Dr. Newman's principal coadjutors in the authorship of the Oxford Tracts were Mossrs. Keble, Pasey, Palmer, Porceval, and Williams. We shall refer to this subject again before closing this article. Newton, Sir Isaac, Dec. 25, 1612 (O. S.)-March 20, 1727, the most illustrious of natural philosophers and one of the most excellent of men, was a native of Woolsthorpe, near Colsterworth, Lincolnshire; the only child of Isaac Newton, proprietor and furner of the manor of Woolsthorpe, by his wife Hannah, the daughter of James Ayscough, of Market Overton, Rutlandshire. Mrs. Newton was left a widow several months before the birth of her child, who came into the world some time before he was expected, and with such little prestige of greatness that the philosopher whose fame was to fill the world could have been readily accommodated in a quart mug. The infant was not only very small, but apparently so feeble that little hopes were entertained of his living until a tonic could be procured from some one of the kind wives of the neighbourhood, who are always ready with sympathies, benedictions, and medicinal herbs on such interest-ing occasions. Two of these good creatures, whose knowledge of the pharmacopæia or stock of remedies was too limited for their desire of usofulness, were hastily despatched to a great woman of the vicinity,-Lady Pakenham, of North Witham,-to invoke her kind offices in behalf of the little stranger who lay gasping in a strait betwixt life and death. It was a day for all good deeds,—

"The happy morn
Wherein the Son of Heaveu's Eternal King,
Of wedded Maid and Virgin Mother born,
Our great redemption from above did bring "— and we doubt not that both the humble messengers when and we doubt not that both the humble messengers whe braved the rigour of the winter's day, and the noble dispenser of the healing baim which rewarded their pains, felt a peculiar pleasure in thus ministering to the necessities of the widow and the fatherless. How great them would have been their exultation—how profound their adoration of the mysterious providence of the great. Father of the human family—could they have foreseen that, in the feeble infant whose life was thus preserved by their areney. All future generations were to recognize the their agency, all future generations were to recognize the chosen interpreter of the laws of Nature to an admiring

Smith, Rector of North Witham, and the immediate care

who now took up her residence at Woolsthorpe. After acquiring the rudiments of an English education at day-schools at Skillington and Stoke, the youth, at the age of twelve, was sent to the public academy at Grantham, where he was first noted for his inattention and backwardness, and subsequently for such zeal in the pursuit of know-ledge that the highest position in the whole school was not thought too great a reward for his merits. It is to be noted that the youthful Newton, during the days of his apparent indolence, did not, like Paley of a future day, waste his hours in inglorious sloth, but had his mind and hands busily employed in the invention and manufacture of ingenious machines, such as windmills, water-clocks, and miniature carriages to be propelled by hand. On the death of his step-father in 1656, Newton's mother left the rectory of North Witham and returned to Woolsthorpe, and the young student, who had now reached his fifteenth year, was summoned to the charge of the farm, the raising of produce, and the superintendence of the sale thereof at Grantham market. The boy obeyed his mother, but he was an unwilling Cincinnatus: his heart was not in his

was an unwilling Cincinnatus: his hoart was not in his work. On market-days, we are told,

"On account of his youth, his mother used to send a trusty old servant along with him, to put him in the way of business. Their inn was at the Saraccu's lieud, in West-gate, where, as soon as they had put up their horses, Isaac generally left the man to manage the marketing, and, retiring to Mr. Clark's garret, where he used to lodge, entertained himself with a parcel of old books till it was time to go home again; or else he would stop by the way between home and Grantham, and lie under a heige studying, till the man went to town and did the business and called upon him in his way back. When at home, if his mother ordered him into the fields to look after the sheep, the corn, or upon any other rural employment, it went on very heavily under his management. His chief delight was to sit under a tree with a book in his hands, or to busy himself with his knife in cutting wood for models of somewhat or other that struck his fancy; or be would get to a stream and make mill-wheels."

Under such a master, who would neither "hold the for much profit from the farm. Isane, therefore, was pormitted to return to his studies at Grantham School, and in June, 1661, we find him admitted sub-sizar at Trinity College, Cambridge. He became a Bachelor of Arts in 1665, a Junior Follow in 1667, and Master of Arts in 1668. Once at college, with none of the petty annoyances of business life and household detail to distract his attention, the genius of Newton soon gave evidence of those amazing powers which were to uttract the eyes of the great philosophers of Europe to the studious recluse of Trinity College. As early as May 20, 1665, he committed to writing his first discovery of Fluxions; in November of the same year he drew up a paper on Fluxions, with their application to the drawing of tangents and "the finding the radius of curvity of any curve;" and about the same time (in the autumn of 1665) of any curve;" and about the same time (in the autumn of 1665) his attention was first directed to the subject of Gravity.

"Neither Pemberton nor Whiston," says Sir David Brewster, who received from Newton himself the story of his first ideas of gravity, "records the story of the falling apple. It was mentioned, hower, to Voltaire by Catherine Barton, Newton's nices, and to Mr. Green by Martin Folkes, the President of the Royal Society. We saw the apple-tree in 1814, and brought away a portion of one of its roots. The tree was so much decayed that it was taken down in 1720, and the wood of it carefully preserved by Mr. Tarnor, of Stoke Rocheford. See Voltaire's Philosophie de Newton, Simpertohap, Ill.; Oreen's Philosophie of Expansive and Contractive Errors, 1855, I. 27, u.; and see it. 416, n.

To these remarks it occurs to us to append a note, which of course applies to a later stage of Newton's researches of course appres to a meer stage of Arewess e assessment in this department:

"Optics had made so great a stride under the genius of Newton that little remained to be gleaned by future observers: but yet Baxwessas has added much to the circle of our knowledge in the polarization of light, and added a now element in the production of harmonicus beauty in the changes of the knielokeop."—Sim Archibato Alison: Hist. of Europe, 1815–1852, chap. v.

"This telescope consisted of a concave metallic speculum, the radius of the curvature of which was 12% or 13 inchos, so that 'it collected the sun's tays at the distance of 6% inches.' The rays reflected by the speculum were received upon a plane metallic speculum, inclined 45° to the axis of the tube, so as to reflect them to the side of the tube, in which there was an aperture to receive a small tube with a plane-convex cycglass, whose radius was one-twelfth of an inch, by means of which the image formed by the speculum was magnified 38 times."

Newton considered with the complimentary request and

Newton complied with the complimentary request, and, as it is supposed, about the close of 1671 his telescope was as it is supposed, about the close of 10.1 his telescope was exhibited to the Royal Society. It was also submitted to the examination of the king. A description of it will be found in Phil. Trans., vol. vii., No. 81, p. 4004, March 25, 1672. It was undoubtedly inferior to the refracting telescopes of Hevelins and Huygens. More than half a contary clapsed before telescopes of the Newtonian form "became useful in astronomy." The justrument of the invontor of the reflecting telescope—James Gregory—was also neglected. After a brief description of the gigantic to give "a correct idea of its effective magnitude," enables to give "a correct idea of its effective magnitude, us to compare it with other instruments by the following table, in which the specula are supposed to be square in place of round:

"A TEX-FEET reflector," remarks Sir David, "will be due to selence before the close of the century: and a disc of fint-glass, 29 inches in diameter, [executed by Messex, Chance, Brothers and Company, of the Smethwick Olass-Works,] awaits the command of some liberal government or some munificent individual to be converted into an achromatic telescope of extraordinary power."—Lifs of Nowton, i. 67.

On the 11th of January, 1672, Newton was rewarded for his ingenuity by an election to membership in the Royal Society, and, on the 18th of the same month, begged to yat Society, and, on the folial of the same month, begged the secretary to inform him "for what time the Society continued their weekly meetings; because," continued he, "if they continue them for any time, I am purposing them to be considered of and examined on account of a philosophical discovery which induced me to the making of the said telescope, and which I doubt not but will prove much more grateful than the communication of that instrument, being in my indement the oddest if not the most considerable detection which judgment the oddest if not the most considerable detection hath hitherto been made in the operations of nature."

This discovery—the communication of which elicited "the solemn thanks" of the Scoiety—was that of the different refrangibility of the rays of light, which Newton had explained to his class in his Lecture on Optics in the University of Cambridge, 1669, 70, and 71. An account of it will be found in Phil. Trans., No. 8, Feb. 19th, 1672

We have seen that it was in the autumn of 1665 that Newton's attention was first drawn to the subject of gravity. Some time in the next year he had arrived at the great truth "that the forces of the planets from the sun as reciprocally duplicate of their distances from him." After some experiments to test his theory that the same giver by which an apple falls from a troe extends to the moin and retains her in her orbit, he "found such a discrepancy between the two tweet that he about doned the ablect, suspecting that the power which retained the moon in her orbit might be partly that of gravity and partly that of the vortices of Descartes. This discrepancy areas from the adoption of an arroneous measure of the small describe of the more discance was taken as a maintain. The more accurate measurement of Pleasa. We have seen that it was in the autumn of 1665 that afforded a surer basis for calculation; but Newton did not "resume his former thoughts concerning the moon" till 1684. On the 10th of December, 1684, Dr. Halley (who himself had anticipated the great discovery to which be was about to refer) informed the Royal Society "that he had lately seen Mr. Newton at Cambridge, who had showed him a curious treatise De Motu," which, at Dr. Halley's desire, he pr.mised to send to the Society to be recorded. Newton made his communication before Feb. 23, 1685, and the treatise De Motu, (24 octavo pages,) the germ of the Principia, was registered in the Chronicles of the Society. It is now time that we had referred the reader, for detailed accounts of the discoveries of Newton, the controversies which they elicited and the results to which they led, to the work to which we have already acknowledged our obligations and intend still further to lay under contribution,—Sir David Browster's Memoirs of the Life, Writings, and Discoveries Brewster's Memoirs of the Life, Writings, and Discoveries of Sir Isaac Newton, 1855, 2 vols. 8vo,—and to the other authorities noticed hereafter. Brewster's Life of Newton was originally pub. as a vol. (xxiv.) of Murray's Family Library, 1831, 18mo. It had a wide circulation, and was warmly commended by the Edin. Rev.. Oct. 1843; Lou. Month. Rev., Athensum; Literary Gazette; Spectator, (Sept. 10, 1831,) M. Herald, (Sept. 15, 1831;) and Asiatic Journal: see Brewster, Sir David, LL.D. and K.H., p. 243, ande. Kneouraced by the favourable recention of his 243, ante. Encouraged by the favourable reception of his little work, the learned author—one of the most illustrious pupils of his great master—felt justified in gratifying his enthusiasm in so noble a cause by collecting the materials for a more comprehensive and detailed account of the life, writings, and discoveries of a mortal so exalted above his race that, had he flourished in ancient Greece, he would —Dr. Johnson assures us—"have been worshipped as a divinity." Ready access was granted to the Newton MSS. in possession of the family of the Earl of Portsmouth, the descendant of Newton's nicce,—the beautiful Catherine Barton. Baily's Life of Flamsteed, pub. in 1835; Rigaud's Historical Essay on the First Publication of Newton's Principia, 1838, 8vo; the (Macclesfield) Correspondence of Scientific Men of the Seventeenth Century, 1841, 2 vols. 8vo; the Correspondence of Sir Isaac Newton and Professor Cotes respecting the publication of the Second Edition of the Principia, edited by J. Edleston, 1850, 8vo; Professor De Morgan's Memoir of Newton, in Knight's Cabinet Historical Library, xi. 78-118, and other recent sources of information, were diligently investigated by Sir David, and in 1855 the results were given to the world in two handsome octavo vols, containing 1064 pages. It is but right to add that this work was very nearly, if not quite, ready for the press at least as early as 1843: the periodical which announced this fact and wondered at the periodical which announced this in a second the opinion delay in the publication of the work ventured the opinion that it will be

"seery way worthy both of the illustrious subject of the narrative and of the distinguished reputation of the writer."—Edin. Rev., lxxviii. 402, Oct. 1843.

On the appearance of the anxiously-expected volumes, they were reviewed by the periodical which had thus heralded their advent. The critic joins issue with the blographer on a number of questions, and thus concludes his disquisitions:

his disquisitions:

"We have not gone into particular literary criticism of Sir D.
Browster's work. But our readers will see how far we have found reason to differ from the author in some points, while we freely admit that the literary and scientific world is deeply indebted to him for the disclosure of a large amount of new information relating to the litustrious subject of this memoir. But amid many highly-heberical passages and copious scientific litustrations of the history of Newton's discoveries, there is to our mind something of a one-sided and disagreeable tone pervading the whole performance; and as a composition we hardly think the work a memorial altogether worthy either of Newton or of Brewster."—

April, 1860.
The London Times, also, (about July or August, 1855,) charges the biographer with undue exaltation of the chacharges the nographer with under examining of the engracter of his subject at the expense of the memories of Rhuygens, Hooke, Leibnitz, and Flamsteed, and with great parelessness in the arrangement of his biographical matter. In the preface to his work, p. xi., Sir David explains the same of one noticeable instance of want of chronological sequence: new information respecting the history of the Principle was obtained after the printing of the first volume, where it would have appropriately been introvalues, where it would have appropriately been intro-duced, and therefore had to be thrown into volume second. The North British Review for August, 1855, devotes a few pages to the consideration of the work, and, whilst ac-inguishing the savrice his book has rendered to our liverature, somplains of the want of that even-handed justice which the orbits just quoted also allege their in-ability to discover:

"Sir David Brewster," says the reviewer, "stands clear of the Ins" putation of art by the mixture of all which art would avoid. A judicious barrister, when he has to admit some human nature in his client, puts an additional trump upon the trick by making some allowance for the other side; and nothing puts the other side in so perlious a prodicament. It is not so with Sir D. Brewster. When sine against Newton are to be punished, we hear Juvenal; when Newton is to be reprimanded, we hear a nice and delicate. Hurse, who can Horace, who can

'In reverend bishops note small defects, And own the Spaniard did a waggish thing' Who cropt our ears and sent them to the king.'"

Nor should we here omit to refer to M. Biot's justificatory papers in Journal des Savans, June, 1832, and May, 1831, of his assertion of Newton's mental derangement in his life of the philosopher in the Biographie Universelle, vol. xxxi., (in English, in the Library of Useful Know-ledge.) This portion of M. Biot's biography had been specially objected to by Sir David in his Life of Newton, pub. in 1831; hence Biot's reaffirmation of his original position. That he entirely failed to satisfy Sir David of the soundness of his conclusions will be perceived by reference to Brewster's new Life of Newton, vol. ii. 140, 184-186, &c. Mr. Edlerton (see Correspondence of Newton and Professor Cotes, pp. 1x.-1xii.) entirely concurs in Brewster's view of this subject. Respecting the period during which, or in which, it is alleged by Biot (who first revived a story which dates back as far as 1693) that revived a story which dates back as-far as 1693) that Newton's mind was under an eclipse, Sr David remarks, "In reviewing the details which we have now given respecting the health and occupations of Newton from the beginning of 1692 to 1693, it is impossible to draw any other conclusion than that he possessed a sound mind, and was perfectly capable of carrying on his mathematical, his physical, and his theological inquiries... Mr. Millington . . . assures Mr. Pepps 'that he is very well; that he fears he is under some small degree of melancholy, but that there is no reason to suspect that it hath at all touched his understanding.' . . . During this period of bodily indeposition, his mind, though in a whate of nervous irribability and disturbed by want of rest, was capable of putting forth its highest powers."—Life of Newton, 1855, il. 164-156.

Wa offer no oninion unon this nainful thorne but seef-1

We offer no opinion upon this painful theme, but refer it to the judgment of the intelligent reader.

We resume the story of Newton's life. In 1687 he pub. his Philosophice Naturalis Principia Mathematica, and in the same year was chosen one of the delegates to represent the University of Cambridge before the High Commission Court, to answer for their refusal to admit Father Francis Master of Arts upon the king's mandamus without his taking the oaths required by the statutes. He deported himself with the utmost courage, "and was not afraid of the king's commandment." In 1688 he was chosen by the University of Cambridge member of the Convention Parliament, and was again elected in 1701. In 1695, through the influence of his long-attached friend, Charles Montague, Earl of Halifax, who had become Chancellor of the Exchequer in the preceding year, Newton was made Warden of the Mint, with a salary of about £600; and in 1699 he succeeded to the mastership, worth from £1200 to £1500 per annum. In this year, also, he was elected one of the eight associate members of the Royal Academy of Sciences in Paris; in 1703 he was chosen President of the Royal Society, which dignified position he held, as he did Royal Society, which dignified position he held, as he did also the mastership of the Mint, for the rest of his life; and in 1705 he was knighted by Queen Anne. With the Princess of Wales, afterwards Queen Caroline, consort to George II., he was an especial favourite; and his company was often requested at the palace, that her majesty might enjoy the pleasure of his conversation.

"George II. and Queen Caroline showed him particular masks of their favour and esteem, and often conversed with him for house together. The queen, in particular, used to take delight in his company, and was accustomed to congratulate herself that the lived in the same country and at the same time with so tilustrious a person."

The philosopher was never married. A writer in the Biographia Britannica, about a century ago, whom from his affected contempt for the pleasures of matrimonial life we suspect to have been a disappointed old bachelor, thus coolly dismisses this important theme:

coolly dismisses this important theme:

"He never married, and perhaps he never had leisure to think of it. Being immersed in profound studies during the prime of his age, and afterwards engaged in an employment of great importance, and even quite taken up with the company which his merit drew to him, he was not sensible of any vacancy in life nor of the want of a companion at home."—Vol. v. 3242, 1760.

It is true that he entertained a great deal of company,

It is true that he entertained a great deal of company, partly drawn, as is observed above, by the "merit" of the great philosopher and partly by the rare beauty and brilllant conversational abilities of the famous Catherine Barton, the daughter of Sir Isaac's half-sister, and the granded daughter of the Rev. Barnabas Smith. After enjoying a most triumphant reign as a fashionable toast, this young lady accepted the hand of Mr. Conduitt, who succeed his uncle-in-law to the mastership of the Mint. Their daughter, who married the eldest son of Lord Lymington, who inherited his father's title, was grandmother of the late Earl of Portsmouth. Notwithstanding Newton's generous style of living, his liberality to the poor, and generous style or living, his interactly to the porty his patronage of distressed men of lotters, he left a personal estate of £32,000, which was divided among his four nephews and four nieces of the half blood, the grandchildren of his mother by the Rev. Mr. Smith. Newton, the heir of the whole blood, whose great-grand-father was Sir Isaac Newton's uncle, inherited the land which Sir Isaac received from his own father and mother. He did no credit to his connexionship, -preferred the bottle to the telescope and the tavern to the observatory, and conferred the only benefit which he had in his power to render to his family and friends by an early departure (setat. 30) from a world the responsibilities of which he neither understood nor attempted to execute. With him the family of Newton became extinct.

The death of this illustrious person, who had enjoyed the rare felicity of seeing two generations of his fellow-men reaping the fruits of his exalted genius, excited a profound seusation at home and abroad. His body lay in state in the Jerusalem Chamber, and was thence conveyed to Westminster Abbey, where it was buried near the entrance into the choir on the left hand. The pall was supported by the Lord High-Chanceller, the Dukes of Montrose and Roxburghe, and the Earls of Pembroke, Sussex, and Macclesfield, who were Fellows of the Royal Society. In Paris the most distinguished body of philosophers of whom the world could boast were called together to hear a culogy from Fontencile on the services of the chosen interpreter who had thus in the maturity of age been permitted to draw nearer to the awful Source of those Laws of Nature which he had so long and so successfully expounded for the instruction of mankind. The orator was warmed by his theme and his auditory; and, anxions to illustrate by his eloquence the splendid discoveries of Newton's early manbood, he passed over his juvenile years with the happy comment that "one may apply to Newton what Lucan says of the Nile,—that it has not been permitted to mortals to see that river in a feeble state." Mr. Conduitt supplied Fontenelle with a Memoir of Newton, (since pub. by Mr. Turnor in his Collections for the History of the Town and Soke of Grantham,) and, among other instructions, begged

"not to emit to mention that Queon Caroline used to delight much in the conversation of Newton; and nothing could do more honour to Newton than the commendation of a queen the Minerva of her ago."

"Fontenelle," remarks Professor Playfair, "was too much a philosopher and a man of the world, and had himself approached too near to the persons of princes, to be of Mr. Condultt's ophilon, or to think that the approbation of the most illustions princess could add dignity to the man who had made the three greatest discoveries yet known, and in whose hands the sciences of Geometry, Optics, and Astronomy had all taken new forms. If he had been called to write the Eloge of the Queen of England, he would, no doubt, have remarked her reliah for the conversation of Newton."

—Third Prelim, Dissert, to Eneye, Brit, 7th ed., 553.

This is well turned; and we like the caprit du corps it evinces. The honours elicited by his genius and virtues seem to have less elated their object than the good Mr. Conduitt. Fontenelle doubtless took a philosopher's pride in declaring that Newton "was not distinguished from other men by any singularity, either natural or affected;" and Dr. Johnson considered it and Dr. Johnson considered it

"as an eminent instance of his superiority to the rest of mankind that he was able to separate knowledge from those weaknesses by which knowledge is generally diagraced; that he was able to excel in science and "risdom without purchasing them by the neglect of little things; and that he stood alone merely because he had left he rest of mankind behind him, not because he deviated from the boaten track."

According to Bishop Atterbury's testimony, there does not appear to have been any thing more remarkable in not appear to have been any thing more remarkable in his appearance than in his manners:

"The cell fort vif et fort percent which Fontenelle gives him," remarks his lordship, "did not belong to him,—at least, for twenty years past, about which time I first became acquainted with him. Itideed, in the whole air of his face and make there was nothing of that penetrating sagacity which appears in his composures. He had something rather leaguid in his look and manner, which did not raise any great expectation in those who did not know him."—Atterbury's Correspondence, vol. ii. p. 329.

"He was blessod," we are told. "with a very happy and vigorous constitution: he was of a middle stature, and rather plump in his latter years is he had... a comely and gracious aspect, and a fine head of hair, se white as silver, without any balances. To the tipad of his last illocas he had the bloom and colour of a young man. He never wore spectacles, nor lost more than one tooth till the day of his death, [in his 85th year.] ... He retained all his senses and faculties to the end of his life, strong, vigorous, and lively. He continued writing and studying many hours every day till the period of his last lineas."

"The book which was commonly lying before him, and which he read oftenest at last," says Mr. Conduitt, " was a duodecimo Bible."

In our life of Sir William Jones (p. 993, ante) we have quoted Sir Isaac Newton's testimony to the authenticity of the volume which he so highly valued. It will be seen that he was anxious that others should share in the studies which experience had proved to be pleasant and profitable to himself:

to himself:

"We have been the dispensers," writes the Rev. Nicolas Wilkins, about ten months after Sir Isaac's death, "of many dozens of Bibles sent by him for poor people: and I have now many by nie sent from him for the same purpose, which as it shows the great regard he had for religion, I cannot but desire that by you it may be made public to the world. Dear sir, my thoughts dwell with wonderful delight upon the memory of this great and good man," &c.—Letter to Mr. Professor Smith, at Trisily College, Cumbridge, Jan. 16th, 1727-28.

"This," says Dr. Pemberton, "I immediately discovered in Jam, which at once both surprised and charmed me:—neith:r his carrons great see nor his universal reputation had rendered? Jam stiff which at once both surprised and charmed me:—neith's his extreme great age nor his universal reputation had rendere? I as stiff in optition, or in any degree calcula."

"Sir Isaac Newton, a little before he died, said, 'I don't know what I may seem to the world; but, as to myself, I seem to invese been only like a boy playing on the sea-shore and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, whilst the great occan of truth lay all unliscovered before me."—R[amsay]. Spence's Ancedates, ed. 1820, 54.

"Mr. Percival, his tenant, who still lives there, fin the house where Newton was born,] says he [Newton] was a man of very few words; that he would sometimes be silent and thoughtful for above a quarter of an hour together, and look all the while almost as if he was saying his prayers: but that when he did speak it was always very much to the purpose."—May 14, 1765, Spance: abi supra, 362.

This reserve no doubt was at some of those times the genuine

Dr. Humphrey Newton, his assistant and amanuensis for nearly five years, from the end of 1683 to '89, tells us that

"His carriage was very meck, sedate, and humble, never seemingly angry, of profound thought, his countenance mild, pleasant, and comely. I cannot say I aver saw him laugh but once. . . . He very rarely went to hed till two or three of the check, sometimes not till free or six, lying about four or fire hours. [He afterwards learned to retire at twelve]. . . He never slept in y daytime, y' I ever perceived. I believe he grandged ye short time he spent in eating and sleeping. . . Ofttimes he has forgot to eat at all, so that, going into his chamber, I have found his meas untouched, of which when I have reminded him, he would reply, 'Have It' and then, making to the table, would eat a bit or two standing, for I cannot say I ever saw him sit at table by himself. Ye old woman his bed-maker in a morning has sometimes found both dinner and supper searcely tasted of, we's ye old woman has very pleasantly and mumpingly gone away with. He very rarely went to dine in the hall, except on some public days, and then, if he has not been minded, would go very carefessly with shoes down at heels, stockings united, surplice on, and his head scarcely combed."—Letters to Mr. Conduitt, Jan. 17 2 2 : Feb. 14 2 2.

The doctor them are the fowl and covered up the empty dish, and desired the servant to get another dressed for his master. Before that was ready the great man came down: he apologized for his delay, and added, (dive me but leave to take my short dinner, and I skall is at your service: I am fatigued and faint.' Saying this, he lifted up the cover, and without any emotion turned about to Stukely with a smile. 'See,' he said, 'what we studious people are: I forgot that I had dined?'"

Dr. Stukely says that

Going home to Coisterworth from Orantham he one-led his horse up Spittelyate Hill, at the town end. When he designed to remount, his horse had slipped the bridle and gone away without his porceiving it; and he had only the bridle in his hand all the way." —Letter to Conducti.

"I have heard my father often say that he has been a witness of what the world has so often heard of,—Sir leane's forgetfulness of his fined when intent upon his studies, and of his rising in a pleasant numner with the satisfaction of having found out some proposition, without any concern for a seeming want of his night's sleep, which he was seemble he had lost thereby."—Nio. On a preceding page (1106) we have had occasion to notice the journey of Dr. Martin Lister to Paris in the year 1698, about thirty years before Newton's decease.

The good doctor, in the course of his rounds among the great men, did not forget the celebrated mathematician hose remarks we have just quoted :

waose remarks we have just quoted:
"The Marquis de l'Hopital, . . whom I found not at home, returned my visit very obligingly. I had a long conversation with him about philosophy and learning. . . Nothing was more pleasing to him than to hear of Mr. Newton's preferment [to the wardonship of the Mint] and that there were hopes that they might expect something more from him."
But the Rev. Dr. Samuel Creil, an eminent German divine, was more highly favoured than the marquis; for in 1726 he was in London and paid his respects to the English philosopher, now in his 84th year. He writes to singlish philosopher, now in his 84th year. He writes to his friend Lacroze, 17th July, 1727,

"I also conversed at different times with the illustrious Newton, who died in the month of March at the age of eighty-five. He read manuscript without spectacles, and without bringing it near his eyes. He still reasoned acutely as he was wont to do, and told me that his memory only had failed him. . . . He was not only deeply versed in mathematics and philosophy, but likewise is theology and ecclesiastical history."

Upon Vigant's (with whom he was very intimate, and took great pleasure in discoursing with him on chemistry) telling him a loose story about a num, he broke of all acquaintance with him."

When Dr. Halley would venture a remark apparently disrespectful to religion, Newton would check him with the reproof, "I have studied these things: you have not." The Rev. S. J. Rigaud pub. in 1814 a Defence of Halley against the Charge of Religious Infidelity; and Professor Rigand, the author's father, coincided in this favourable opinion of Halley. Sir David Brewster seems to take the same charitable view. The indifference to appearances which the philosopher exhibited when absorbed in his scientific investigations sometimes led to amusing mis-scientific investigations sometimes led to amusing mistakes,—c. g.;

"When six lease Newton changed his residence and went to live in Leicester Place, his next-door neighbour was a widow lady, who was much puzzied by the little she had observed of the philosopher. One of the Fellows of the Royal Society of London called upon her one day, when, among other domostle news, she mentioned that some one had come to reside in the adjoining house who she felt cartain was a poor crazy gentleman, 'because,' she continued, 'he diverts himself in the oddest ways imaginable. Every morning, when the sun shines so brightly that we are obliged to draw the window-blinds, he takes his soat in front of a tub of scap-suds, and occupies himself for hours blowing soap-bubble through a common clay pipe, and intently watches them till they burst. He is doubtless now at his favourite amusement, 'she added: 'do come and book at him.' The gentleman smiled, and then went up-stairs, whish, after locking through the window into the adjoining yard, he karned round and soid, 'My dear madam, the person whom you suppose to be a poor lunatic is no other than the great 'fir isaac' Newton, stulying the refraction of light upon thin plates,—a phenomenon which is beautifully exhibited upon the surface of a symmon scap-bubble."

"The able analysis and commentary recently published by Lord Brougham and Mr. Routh places Newton's immortal work, in a most convenient form, within the reach of the modern student."—Ethin. Rev. April. 1855: Sir Isuac Newton. (Notice of Browster's Life of Newton, ed. 1855.)

It is to be regretted that such an aid was not vouchsafed to the generation which hailed the birth of the Principia; for Humphrey Newton tells us,

"After the printing, Sir Isaac was pleased to send me with several of them in presents to some of the heads of colleges, and othersof his acquaintance, some of whom (particularly Dr. Hablington, of Trinity) said that they might study seven years before they understood any thing of it."

The student, of course, will carefully peruse Stephen Peter Rigaud's [Savilian Prof. of Astronomy] Historical Essay on the First Publication of Newton's Principia; 810; The Correspondence of Sir Isase Newton and Professor Cotes respecting the Publication of the and Procesor Cotes respecting the Fundamental of the Second Edition of the Principla, edited by J. Edleston, 1850, 8vo; Correspondence of the Scientific Men of the Seventeenth Century, 1841, 2 vols. 8vo. See also Edin. Rev., Oct. 1843, (Sir Isaac Newton and his Contemporaries,) April, 1856, (Sir Isane Newton.)

It would be easy to quote many testimonies to the won-derful intellectual ability displayed in the Principia, but it would be very difficult to match the modest estimate which the author himself placed upon his production:

"When I wrote my treatise about our system," (in the Third Book of the Principle.) he wrote to Dr. Beutley in 1692, "I had an ge upon such principles as might work with considering men for the belief of a Delty; and nothing can rejoyce me more than to find it useful for that purpose. But, if I have done the public any service this way, it is due to nothing but industry and patient thought."—Four Letters to Ir. Bentley, 1756, 8vo.

This humility is in entire keeping with the character of the author; but other philosophers speak in a very different strain:

"It may be justly said that so many and so valuable philosophical truths as are herein discovered and put past dispute were never yet owing to the capacity and industry of any one man."—
EDBUND HALLEY: Phil. Truns., vol. xvi. p. 296.

"The importance and generality of the discoveries, and the immense number of original and profound views which have been the germ of the most brilliant theories of the philosophers of this century, and all presented with much elegance, will ensure to the work on the Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy a pre-uninence above all the other productions of human genius."—

"It is chiefly, too, since the time of Newton that the ontology and pneumatology of the dark ages have been shandoned for singuirles resting on the solid bases of experience and analogy, and that philosophers have felt themselves emboldened, by his astonishing discoveries concerning the more distant parts of the material walverse, to argue from the known to the unknown parts of the moral world."—Dicald Brewaux: First Prelium Dissert, to Energy, Britz, 7th ed., 140.

Satisfying himself of the laws which requiete the motion of tables in trajectories around given centres, he can convince himself of the sublime truths unfolded in that immortal work," &c.—Loan likecten(x): Describe, on Subjects connected with Natural Theology, 1839, in 243-180.

"No one for sixty years after the publication of the Principlation of for sixty years after the publication of the Principlation, with Newton's methods, no one up to the present day—has added any thing of any value to his deductions. We know that be calculated all the principal lunar inequalities: in many of the cases he has given us his processes, in others only his results. But who has presented in his becausing leading the deduction of the Principles, any of the inequalities which he left uncouched? The ponderous instrument of synthesis, so effective in his hand, has never since been grasped by one who could use it for such purposes; and we gaze at it with admiring curiosity, as on some guantic implement of war which stands tille among the memorials of ancient days and makes us wonder what minimer of man he was who could wield as a weapon what we can hardly handle as a barrien."—18. "The Theory of the Moon, which crowns his immortal Principia, is a production of genus, sagacity, and invention almost superhuman. Ho ascends with admirable order from the caseer to the more difficult problems, reducing them always to greater simplicity; he mersuse his angenymation with consuminate address and human. He ascends with admirable order from the easier to the more difficult problems, reducing them always to greater simplicit; he pursues his approximations with consummate address, and, seldom passing the clear bounds of geometry or entangling his demonstrations in the labyranth of algebracal formule, he ad-vances with elegance and apparently without effort to the disclo-sure of the most recondits tuths. —Six John Leslix: Fourth Dissert to Energy. Bril., 7th ed., 663.

Perhaps Sir David Browster's most eloquent passage is that in which he colebrates the exceeding glory of the Principia:

that in which he celebrates the exceeding given of the Principia:

"A work," says he, "which will be memorable not only in the annals of one science or of one country, but which will form an epoch in the history of the world, and will ever be regarded as the brightest page in the records of human reason,—a work (may we not add?) which would be read with delight in every planet of our system—in every system of the universe. What a glorious privilege was it to have been the author of the Principia! There was but one earth upon whose form and trees and inevenents the philosopher could exercise his genius,—one mean whose perturbations and inequalities and at tions he could study.—one sun whose controlling force and apparent motions he could calculate and determine,—one system of planets whose mutual disturbances could tax his highest reason.—one system of comets whose eccentric paths he could explore and rectify.—and one universe of stars to whose binary and multiple combinations he could extend the law of terrestrial gravity. To have been the chosen sage summoned to the study of that earth, those systems, and that universe—the favoured lawgiver to worlds unnumbered, the high-priest in the temple of boundless space—was a privilege that could be granted but to one member of the human family; and to have executed the task was an achievement which in its magnitude can be measured only by the infinite in time. That Sage, that Lawgiver, that High-Priest, was Aceston."—Life of Newton; 1855, i. 318–319. See also ii. 190, 250, ii. 398.

Professor Playfair truly remarks that,

"When one considers the splendour of Newton's discoveries, the beauty, the simplicity and grandeur of the system they unfolded, and the demonstrative evidence by which that system was supprocted, one could hardly doubt that to be received it required only to be made known, and that the establishment of the Newtonian philosophy all over Europe would very quickly have followed the ruddention of it. In drawing this conclusion, however, we should make too small an allowance for the influence of received opinion, said the resistance that more hablit is able for a time to oppose to the strongest evidence. The Cartesian system of vortices had many followers in all the countries of Europe, and particularly in France. ... For more than thirty years after the publication of those discoveries the system of vortices kept its ground."—Dissert.

Even Even English, when he delivered the alongent Element

Even Fontenelle, when he delivered the eloquent Éloge Aven a oncourse, when he convered the stodeent Eloge a Newton from which we have quoted on a preceding page, remained a Cartesian; and the Chanceller D'Aguessean refused to license the publication of Voltaire's work became it disproved the vortices. Cassini and Maraldi, and Huygens, were also among the opponents of the new philicaphy. As regards its introduction at home, Newton, Whitton, and Saunderson taught it at Cambridge; Keilla therefore onemas to the Cartesian and David Gressore onemas to of Oxford; and James and David Gregory opened to its strange the doors of the Universities of St. Andrew's and Edinburgh. It is not to be supposed, however, that it great a revolution in philosophy was effected without a struggle. See Playfair's Prelim. Dissert, 506-507; Browster's Life of Newton, 1855, i. 336-342.

The ingenious manner in which Dr. Samuel Clarke aided the progress of the Newtonian principles at Cambridge we have already explained in our life (p. 361, caste) of that eminout philosopher. The triumph of Newton was indeed

"No one," says Professor Playfair, "ever left knowledge in a state so different from that in which he found it. Men were instructed not only in new truths, but it now methods of discovering old truth: they were made acquainted with the great principle which connects together the most distant regions of succe as well as the most remote periods of duration, and which was to lead to further discoveries for beyond what the wasst or most sanguing could anticipate,"—Prelim. Discret., 572,—where read Playfair's comparison between the respective merits of Leibnitz and Nowton.

These great names can hardly be coupled without recalling the long-vexed question as to priority in the invention of fluxions. We can do nothing more to the purpose than quote the results of Sir David Brewster's purpose than quote the results of Sir David Brewster's elaborate investigations into this knotty subject:

"The following are the results to which we have arrived:
"I. That Newton was the first inventor of the Method of Plazeons; that the method was incomplete in its notation; and that the fundamental principle of it was not published to the world till 1697,—twenty years after he had invented it.
"2. That Leibnitz communicated to Newton, in 1677, his Differential Culculus, with a complete system of notation, and that he published it in 1684,—three years before the publication of Newton's method.
"The admission of these two facts ought to satisfy the most ardent friends of the rival inventors."—Life of Newton, 1855, it. 78.

If the investigation had resulted less favourably to Newton's claims, he could well afford the loss; for his contemporary, Professor Keill, assures us "that, if all philosophy and mathematics were considered as constituing of ten parts, nine of them would be found to be improved by his invention."

In the comparison between Newton and Leibnitz, Professor Playfair remarks that

"Newton to equal inventions in mathematics added the greatest discoveros in the philosophy of nature; and, in passing through his hands, Mechanics, Optics, and Astronomy were not merely im-proved, but responsed."—Prelial. Dissert, 572.

monts of the great minds which ruled the republic of letters and the domain of science towards the close of the reign of Charles II., Lord Macaulay remarks,

"But the glory of these men, eminent as they were, is cast into the shade by the transcendent lustre of one immortal name. In Issae Newton two kinds of intellectual power—which have little in common and which are not often found together in a very high degree of vigour, but which, nevertheless, are equally necessary in the most sublime departments of natural philosophy—were united as they have never been united before or since. There may have been minds as happily constituted as his for the cultivation of pure mathematical science; there may have been minds as happily constituted for the cultivation of science purely experimental; but in oo other mind have the demonstrative faculty and the inductive faculty coaxisted in such supreme excellence and perfect harmony. Perhaps in an age of Scotists and Thomists even his intellect might have run to waste, as many intellects mind, and his mind reacted with tenfold force on the spirit of the age in which his lot was cost gave the right direction to his mind, and his mind reacted with tenfold force on the spirit of the age. In the year 1695, his force, though spiendid, was only dawning; but his gonius was in the meridian. His great work—that work which effected a revolution in the most important provinces of natural philosophy—had been completed, (it was completed in May, 1886,) but was not yet published, (in midsummer, 1937, and was just about to be submitted to the consideration of the floyal Society [submitted May, 1886]."—Hist. of England, vol. i., 1849, chap. iii.

"If Sir Isaac Newton had not been distinguished as a mathematician and a natural philosopher, he would have enjoyed a high reputation as a theologian. . . When Voltairo asserted that Sir Isaac explained the Prophecies in the same manner as those who went before him, he only exhibited his ignorance of what Newton wrote and of what others had written: and when he stated that Newton composed his Commentaries on the Apocalypse to console mankind for the great superiority which he had over them, he but showed the emptiness of the consolation to which scepticism aspires. . England may well be proud of having had Napier, and Milton, and Locke, and Newton for the champions both of its faith and its Probestantism."—Sir David Brewster : Life of Newton, 1856, it 313, 356.

M. Biot remarks of the Historical Account that "an erulition the most vast, the most varied, and the most ready always supports an argument well arranged and powerfully combined."—Life of Newton.

Mr. Orme says that "These letters contain a considerable display of learning in opposition to the received readings of these important texts."

It is well known to Biblical critics that the weight of authority is decidedly against the authenticity of 1 John v. 7. Wetstein, Griesbach, Gibbon, and especially Porson in his Letters to Archdeacon Travis, combat its defenders with great vigour. Sir Charles Lyell goes so far as to say that by Porson's Letters the "question was forever set at rest." (Second Visit to the United States, i. 122.) Bishop Burgess, notwithstanding all opposition, resolutely maintained its right to a place in the sacred canon. Sir David Brewster remarks,

Brewster remarks,

"As the tendency of the Historical Account, &c. was to deprive the defenders of the doctrine of the Trinty of the aid of two leading tals, Sir Isaac Newton has been regarded by the Socialians and Arana, and even by some ortholox divines, as an antitrinitarian; but this opinion is not warranted by any thing which he has published."—Life of Newton, 1855, if 337.

M Rint also access

M. Biot also says, "There is absolutely nothing in the writings of Newton which can justify, or even authorize, the conjecture that he was an anti-trintarian."—Biog. Univ., xxxi. 140.

Sir David Brewster also remarks, i I had no hesitation, when writing the Life of Sir Isaac Newton in 1830, in coming to the conclusion that he was a believer in the Trinity," &c.—Life of Newton, 1858, ii. 340.

But in 1836 Sir David Brewster found among the papers of Sir Isaac, at Hurtsbourne Park, a number of theological MSS. (some of which he has since given to the world in his Life of Newton, 1855.) bearing on the Athunasian controversy, &c. Among the most remarkable of these are 22 Queries regarding the word byours. See Brewster's Life of Newton, 1855, it. 341-355, and Appendix, xxix., xxx. 526-534. It would appear, from Sir David's remarks in the Preface (p. xv.) of his new Life of Newton, that the perusal of these papers had altered the biographer's estimate of the theological apinions of Sir Isaac. We conceive that we can do nothing fairer in the premises than to submit the whole question to the careful consideration of the reader:

question to the careful consideration of the reader:

"That the greatest philosopher of which any age can beasi," remarks Sir David, "was a sincere and humble believer in the leading doctrines of our religion and lived conformably to its precepts, has been justly regarded as a proud triumph of the Christian faith. . . If such be the character of Christian truth, we need not be surprised that it was embraced and expounded by such a genius Sir Isaco Newton. Cherisbing its doctrines and leaning on its promises, he felt it his duty, as it was his delight, to apply to it that intellectual strength which had successfully surmounted the difficulties of the material universe. . He added to the cloud of witnesses the brightest name of ancient or of modern times. 'What wonder, then, that his devotion swelled Responsive to his knowledge! for could he whose plercing mental eye diffusive saw The finished university of things,

"Newton's works are very familiar, experimental, holy, and edifying... His convension was remerkable; and his works manifest that rich Christian experience which such a course as his, under the Divine Spirit, was adapted to give. His letters show great knowledge of the heart and furnish excellent lossons of Christian wisdom."—Bickerskith's C. N. 1844, 321, 444.

The Rev. F. Cunningbam, recommending Newton's Works (1 vol. imp. 8vo) to the careful perusal of all classes, remarks that "to the young it shows the evil and the shame attendant upon a sinful course. To the penitent it points out the remission of sin through faith in the sacrifice and righteomeness of Christ. To the established Christian it will be found to abound in edification and encouragement. To all it will teach the power of the grace of God in subduing and turning the heart."

"Crescit amor nummi quantum ipsa pecunia crescit."-- Luverale This holds good both of the excellent Nichols and his realers. Having perused, with inexpressible delights to vols. and 12,536 pages (now before us) of the preceding library, (the 17th vol., 800 pp., has been pub. but a few? days and is not yet in America,) we claim a right to expatiate with enthusiasm on its abounding merits. The order of publication was as follows. The "brochure of 52 pages was superseded in 1782 by a quarto vol. entitled Hiographical and Literary Anecdotes of William Bowyer, Printer, F.S.A., and of many of his Learned Friends, [see Bowyer, William, pp. 229–230, cate,] &c., pp. 666. This in its turn was superseded by the following volumes: Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century; comprising Biographical Memoirs of William Bowyer, Printer, F.S.A. and many of his Learned Friends, an Incidental View of the Progress and Advancement of Literature in this Kingdom during the Last Century, and Biographical Anecdotes of a Considerable Number of Eminent Writers and Ingenious Artists; with a very Copious Iudex, by John Nichols, F.S.A. In Six Volumes. Vols. i.-v., 1812; vi., Part 1, [there was no Part 2: vol. vii. succeeds,] 1813; vii., Containing a Copious Index to the Preceding Volumes, 1813; vii., Part 2, Containing a Copious Index to volumes 1813; vii., Part 2, Containing a Copious Index to volumes viii. and ix., 1816; [This model Index—1440 columns of Indexes to 11,554 columns of text—we have already deservedly commended in our article on Indexes in the life of Saml. Ayscough, p. 85, ante;] viii., 1814; ix., 1815. These vols. were followed by Illustrations of the Literary History of the Eighteenth Century; consisting of Authentic Memoirs and Original Letters of Eminent Persons, and Intended as a Sequel to The Literary Anecdotes, by John Nichols, F.S.A.: volumes i., ii., 1817; iii., 1818; iv., 1822; v., 1828; vi., 1831; [v. and vi. were posthumous: John Nichols died in 1826, leaving vol. v. "nearly completed at the press." His son, John Bowyer Nichols, and the son the press." His son, John Bowyer Nichols, and the son of the latter, John Gough Nichols, completed vol. v., and prepared vols. vi., vii., and viii. for the press. Vols. vii. and viii. bear on the title-page By John Bowyer Nichols;] vii., 1848; viii., 1858. Vol. viii. contains Chalmers's Memoir of Nichols, with Addenda; the Percy Correspondence, (continued from vol. vii.;) Additions and Corrections to the preceding sixteen volumes, pp. 250; and an Index to the whole eight volumes of the Illustrations. A notice of this volume will be found in the London Athenaum, March 27, 1858, 393-395. When we consider that the Bowyer Press commenced its labours about one hundred and sixty years ago, (in 1699,) and, under the management of the yours ago, (in 1998), and didet in management to two Rowyers and three Nicholses, has ever since been pouring forth its contributions to the scientific, classical, biographical, bibliographical, topographical, and typographical departments of the Republic of Letters, who can fail to regard this same Bowyer Press as one of the noblest institutions of Old England, to be venerated with Magna Charta and toasted with the Bill of Rights? In our notice of that time-honoured periodical the Gentleman's Magazine, more than 200 volumes of which now gaze benignantly upon us from their "lofty" shelves, we remarked,

"It has been in one family about fourscore years: and may the Nicholses 'live a thousand years,' and issue the Gentlemau's Magasine 'punctually on the first of every month!" See Care, En-

WARD, p. 35ft, ante.

Part (not the largest part) of the "thousand years" has run out since this was written, and the "Nicholses," "always ready to accommodate their numerous friends and customora," have politely acceded to our request: they "still live," and so does the Gentleman's Magazine. But, alsa for the changes of "Time's whirligig," they live no longer together! The Preface to the Number for June, 1856, contains the following announcement:

1856, contains the following announcement:

"It is with mingled feelings of gratitude and of regret that we announce that, for reasons of a personal nature, the name of Nesous will honceforth appear less prominently on our title page.

"It is now nearly eighty years since the late Mr. John Nichols became connected with the dientleman's Magazine, and, sided by a host of literary friends, among whom may be particularly distinguished Richard Gough, conducted it with great success to the period of his death, in the year 1826. From that until the present date it has been carried on by the proprietrs, who are now induced, by the great age of the one and want of health of the other, to relinquish the chief conduct of it into other hands."

And the name of Nichols disappears from the title-page,—"no son of his succeeding." We trust, however, that the sonior of the new firm, (see Vol. Two Hundred and First,) John Henry and James Parker, is a descendant of David Henry, Edward Cave's brother-in-law, who was connected with the Magasine from 1754 to "92. "Mr. Noel's praching is eminently evangelical. The distinctive coeffices of the gospel are the topics on which he almost invariably dwells... He is a most pleasing as well as instructive and impressive pressober. He is one of the five ministers whom one could hear by hours in succession without wishing they were done."—

Mstroped. "Asipti, il. 38, 50.

"His voice is melodious in the extreme: one more musical we takink we never heard... His principal fault as a preacher is eleboration: sometimes he dilates an idea until almost all trace of it is lost or it is but faintly perceived."—Pon-Pictures, dc., 68, 73.

"Mr. Noel is not a man of masculine mind; he is rarely either original or profound; but his matter is always above medicerity, and its eloquence is more equally suntained than that of the great majority of other popular preachers. If he never dazzles by brilliancies, he never suffers the attention to fing by descending to commonplace observations."—Fish's Pulpit Eloquence, dr., 642.

"Bis is certainly a most interesting and delightful preacher; altogether extemporaneous; mild and personaire in his manner, his head of the manner has been as a fine and the manner.

"He is certainly a most interesting and delightful preacher; altogether extemporaneous; mild and persuasive in his manner, yet sufficiently impressive, and sometimes powerful, having a very clear and consistent flow of thought; decidedly evangelleal in doctrine, though less deep and instructive in dectrine, than I had oxposted,"—Dr. Tyng's Recollections of England, 1847, 31.

"His features are very symmetrical and present a really beautiful profile. He is not very elected in his appearance. . . . He has light hair, light-tlue eyes, and, in fine, the general spect of a good rather than a great man. . . . Bautist Noel is one of the best and most agreeable men 1 have met in Paris."—Stevens's Letters from Europe.

"The light which these volumes throw upon a period described by Mr. Fox as "one of the most singular and important of our later; and the disclosures which they present of the court-in-brigges of that day, so difficult to be understood even with all the illustrations which the researches of later times have produced. Are perhaps greater than those to be devived from any other meanting to the same period, with the exception of Burnet and the lately published Staart MSS."—Brites: Profice.

"Roger North's 116 of his brother, the lord-keeper, is the most valuable specimen of this class of our literature. It is delightful, and much beyond any other of the writings of his contemporaries."—S. T. Cousnoz.

"This old piece of logal biography, which has been lately republished. [1808, 2 vols. 8vo.] is one of the most delightful books in the world. Its charm does not consist in any marvellous incidents of Lord Guilford's life or any peculiar interest attaching to his character, but in the unequalied anivoté of the writer, in the singular felicity with which he has thrown himself into his subject, and in his vivid delineations of all the great lawyers of his time."—Bix T. "Boger North's Life of the Lord-Keeper, like Boswell's Life of Johnson. Interests us highly without giving us a very exalted notion of the author. biography, and the biographer in utter contempt:

"Burnet and Kennet have given no very favourable character of the keeper; his relation, Roger North, has defended him in a very bulky work, which, however, does not contribute much to raise our ideas either of the writer or his subject. If that performance and its companion, the Examen, had nothing else rideulous is them, it would be sufficient to blast their reputation that they aim at decrying that excellent magistrate.—the Lord-Chief-Justice Hale,—and that Charles the Second and that wrotch the Dake of Lauderdale, the king's taking money from France and the seizure of the Charter of London, are some of the men and some of the measures the author defended. It is very remarkable fourtinus Walpole, in a notel that two peers of this race have suffered by applogies written for them by two of their own relations; but with this difference naturally attending the performances of a sensible man and a weak one: Dudley, Lord North, has [in his Like of Edward, Lord North, and; shown himself an artful and elseant historian; Roger North, a miserable biographer."—Lives of R. and N. There have been no divorce, and since that period no intercourse, There are not matters on which we feel called upon to exercise adjudication, and in the present instance we imply neither censure nor exculpation of any party when we observe that Mrs Norton seems to enjoy the almost unbounded confidence, admiration, and affection of those who have recorded their opinions on the unbappy dif-ference which first caused and has so long perpetuated a divided household. "The present volume cannot but be accepted on Mrs. Norton's part as a step in advance of her former works. Her verse has more depth of thought, more regularity of structure, than formerly: increased exectness of cadence could hardly have been expected, for Mrs. Norton's poetry was always instinct with melody,"—Lon. "This lady," says H. N. Coleridge, in a notice of Mrs. Norton's postry often quoted, "is the Byron of our modern poetesses. She has very much of that intense personal passion by which Byron's poetry, is distinguished from the larger grasp and deeper communion with man and nature of Wordsworth. She has also Byron's leasnthil intervals of tenderness, his strong practical thought, and beautiful intervals of tenderness, bis strong practical thought, and his forceful expression."—Lon. Quar. Islands" is the (then) iffant Prince of Wales.

"In this poem we have a picture of England and the social condition of her children, designed to remedy in some measure the want of communication between classes and impress the imagination of the future "ruler of the islands" with a due sense of the wants, trials, and temptations of his humbler fellow-creatures.

"This brilliant volume has not materially softened our suppleton that the present purveyors of our popular literature are on a false track. We still doubt whether any great good will come of this eternal reproduction in imaginative works of the "Condition of England Question". There can be no question that the performance bears throughout the stamp of extraordinary ability: the sense of easy power very rarely deserts us. But we panse on the bursts of genius: and they are many. . . We wish we had room for a score more of these mesterly sketches; but we hope we have given enough, not to excite attention, for that such gifts employed with anch energy must at once command, even were the name on the title-page a new one, but enough to show that we have not observed with indifference this manifestation of developed skill, this fairest wreath as yet won in the service of the graver Muses for the manse of Sucritans."—J. "Topics so common to the interaction of the times, and a pian so arbitrary and artificial, can have little intrusive power. The interest of the work must arise from its workmanship; and the merit of this is great in several points of view. Ease and flaish of diction prevail throughout, with much beauty of thought and imagery, and a spirited style."—Lon. Spectator.

To Mrs. Norton's abiding honour be it recorded that "The real character of The Child of the Islands is a series of outpourings upon the condition of the poor."—Lon. Spectator, ubi

This holy cause was not a new theme with Mrs. Norton: in her Voice from the Factories in 1836, (ante.) in her Letters to the London Times in 1841, and in the stirring eloquence of "immortal verse" at various times and sea sons, she had pleaded on behalf of the poor and the desolate, the criminal and the outcast, the miserable and the foreaken. And we venture to assert that in the retrospection of such advocacy she takes far greater delight than in recounting the many willing tributes of admiration and sympathy which beauty, genius, and sorrow have gathered from two hemispheres.

Noti, Josiah, M.D., b. March 31, 1804, in Union District, South Carolina, and a son of Judge Abraham District, South Carolina, and a son of Judge Abraham Nott, of that State, graduated at South Carolina College, 1824, received his medical diploma at Philadelphia, 1829, and practised both in the North and at Columbia in his matter State; completed his medical studies in Paris and London; in 1836 removed to Mobile, Alabama, where he has since resided. 1. Grones, M.D. Since the footier of the Types of Mankind (pp. 678-679, casts) were printed, we have met with another review of that volume if the Westminster Review, April, 1856, in which the critic ex-

"The writers of the 'T3 pea of Mankind' have done well by this fresh and rich contribution to the science of ethnology, the result of very diligent inquiry, towards recalling attention to the question of its true philosophy."

Mr. George R. Gliddon, one of the authors of the volume, died at Panama, Nov. 16, 1857, aged 50. See Historical Magazine. (New York.) Jan. 1858, 32. 3. With George R. Gliddon, Indigenous Races of the Earth; or, New Chapters of Ethnological Inquiry, including Monographs on Special Departments of Philology, Iconography, Cranioscopy, Palæontology, Pathology, Archæology, Com-parative Geography, and Natural History; contributed by Alfred Maury, &c., Francis Pulszky, &c., J. 650. "We had had a little experience of how our American friends treat ethnological questions in the "Types of Mankind;" and when a work of the same potentious sixs, with the same ugly heads of 'inferior races," the same list of subscribers, and the same editors, made its appearance, we found that the cause of ethnological science could not gain much thereby,"—Lon. Athen., 1867, 1140.

We need hardly observe that the learned in those subjects will not be willing to abide by the dieta of reviewers, but will examine the points in controversy for themselves Dr. Nott has contributed articles on Ethnology, Medical Science, Life-Insurance, &c. to the Amer. Jour. of Med. Science, Charleston Med. Jour., New Orleans Med. Jour., South Quar. Rev., Do Bow's Commercial Rev., and other periodicals. He is also the author of an Appendix ("containing a Summary of the Latest Scientific Facts bearing upon the Question of Unity or Plurality of Species") to H. Hatz's translation of Count A. De Clobineau's Moral and Intellectual Diversity of Races. Phila., 1857, 12mo.

"The most acceptable and characteristic memorial of this excellent man. His Correspondence, like that of his venerable friend, (John Newton.) was genuine 'Cardiphonia,'—the utterance of the heart.—the 'bubbling up of a good matter' as from the spring-head within.—Christus is Cord., ... Mr. Nottidge's thoughts were those of no ordinary mind. The Greek trans. of the Larger Catechism is said to have been printed in 1675, and of the Smaller in 1575; but there seems to be some uncertainty in these dates, (v. authorities post.) What is called Nowell's Third Catechism has been supposed to be the same in whole or in part as the Church Catechism in the English Liturgy. Strype expressly assigns the Church Catochism to Nowell; but Churton, Nowell's blographer, questions his title to it, and is disposed to attribute it to Poinet, aftertitle to it, and is disposed to attribute it to Poinet, afterwards Bishop of Winchester. When we speak of "Nowell's Catechiem," without explanation, we refer to his larger Catechiemus, 1570, &c. There have been several new edits. of this in Latin pub. at Oxford recently,—viz.: 1830, 1835, and (cura G. Jacobson) 1844. Last cd. of Norton's trans, Lon., 1846, 12mo. Nowell's Catechiems greatly a'ded the Reformation in England, and were highly valued by those who favoured ecclesiastical and theological changes:

23, 25, and the one following, and in all greatly distinguished himself by his opposition to the king's prerogative. His political sentiments, however, were suddenly changed in 1631 by his appointment to the post of attorney-general Managed. Henceforth he disgusted even such zealous royalists as Clarendon by originating and urging some of the attreme measures which resulted in the ruin of Charles II.: treme measures which resulted in the rum of Unaries 11. "thinking that he [Noy] could not give a clearer testimony that his knowledge of the law was greater than all other man's time by making that law which all other men believed not to be so. So he moulded, framed, and pursued the odlous and crying preject of soap, and with his own hand drew and prepared the write for shipmoney, both of which will be the lasting monuments of his fame."

"As Lord Hale makes so frequent a reference to Noy's Reports, it may not be amiss to apprise the student that though the books is known by the name of that very learned lawyer, yet there is not the least reason to suppose that such a loose collection of notes was intended by him for the public eye. In an edition of Noy's Reports genes editorem, there is the following observation upon them in manuscript: A simple collection of scrups of cases made by Serjeant Size from Noy's loose papers, and imposed spon the would for the reports of that cile prerogative fellow Noy. This account of Noy's Reports, which was probably written soon after the first publication in 1668, though expressed in terms inexcussibly gross, contains an aneedote not altogether useless. 2 Ro. As before noticed, (p. 1448, ants.) Dr. Charles O'Conor printed the first part of the above annals in vol. iv. (the last, 1826) of the Rerum Hibernienrum Scriptores Veteres Buckingbamiæ. We have seen that the Scriptores Veteres Buckinghamise.

Scriptores Veteres Buckinghamire. We have seen that the editor's labours have not escaped criticism; and, as regards his edition of the Annals of the Four Masters, "His text is full of errors: it is printed in the Italic character, and the contractions of the manuscript, which in many places Dr. O'Conor ortidently misunderstood, are allowed to romain, although without any attempt to represent them by a peculiar type. These are also many serious errors and defects in his lattic translation, arising partly from the cause just alluded to, but chiefly from ignorance of Irish topography and geography."—Dr. O'Donovas.

Prof. to Annals, vol. 1, ed. 1856.

Dr. O'Donovan's knowledge of Irish topography is not to be questioned; for, as he assures us in the advertise.

Dr. O'Donovan's knowledge of tries topography is not to be questioned; for, as he assures us in the advertise-ment of his Irish Grammar, he has "at various times visited every county in Ireland." On the value of the Annals of the Four Masters (three O'Clerys,—Tiege of the Munitain, or Brother Michael, Cucogrine or Peregrine, and Conary,—and Cucogry or Peregrine O'Mulconry) it is hardly necessary to cularge. Jacob Grimm, Dr. Petrié, Prof. Eugene Curry, Guizot, Hallam, Lord Talbot de Malahide, and other historical critics have nord latest commande, and other historical crimes have said enough on this head to render any addition super-fluous. This great work was commenced Jan. 22, 1632, and completed August 18, 1636. There appear to have been four transcripts, all of which, in whole or in part, are still extant and have been carefully collated by O'Donovan.

Oldenburg, Henry, 1626-1678, a native of Lower Saxony, and a descendant of the Counts of Oldenburg, came to England in 1653, became a Secretary of the Royal Society, and long maintained an extensive correspondence with learned men in different parts of the world. The most remarkable characteristic we can find concerning this philosopher is his habit of answering letters the moment he had read them,—almost the only instance, besides our own, which ever came to our knowledge. By this admirable niethod Oldenburg managed to keep up a learned correspondence with more than seventy serests. He pub. three translations on Solids, 1671, 8vo; Book of Revelations, &c., 1671. found in the North American Review, April, 1857, 426469. We extract a few paragraphs:

"This book a designed to tell 'the other side of the story' of the fathers of Massachusetts. It contains an unfavourable, an unfriendly, an excessively severe, disquisition upon their policy. It subjects to a most unsparing freedom of criticism their motives, principles, and conduct, as well as their peculiar institutions in church and state. . He has made a most diligent and exhumative use of the original sources of information on all matters pertaining to our history. A world of labour must be have spont in his task.

Mr. Oliver has a way of quoting a part when the whole would not serve him. He is also apt to add glosses of his own. . . Mr.
Oliver niterity misconstrues the Puritans, from the beginning to the end of his elaborate and most richly-wrought essay. He starts with a bias which perverts his judgment. . . The book is written in a style of unsurpassed beauty. It has every grace of facile and attractive composition. Uniformly correct and chaste in diction, pointed and terse in its emphatic passages, exact and chastened in its in-toric, it occasionally presents sentences and paragraphs in which the cast of the language and the fitness of the imagnay compel our admiration."—426, 432, 433, 437.

Ombler, E. Soc KNAPP, J. W., No. 2. O'Meara, Barry Edward, M.D., 1778-1836, a native of Ireland, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and at the Royal College of Surgeons, served in capacity of surgeon both in the Royal Army and Royal Navy, and, attracting the attention and regard of Napoleon, who found him on board the Bellerophon, he was induced to accom-pany the latter to St. Helena. Notwithstanding the appro-bation which his conduct elicited from Sir George Cockburn, Sir Pultency Malcolm, (custodians of Napoleon.) and Lord Melville, he differed so widely in opinion with Sir Hudson Lowe that he resigned his post in July, 1818, returned to England, preferred charges against Sir H. Lowe, and was dismissed from the naval service November 2, 1818. The alloged cause of this degradation will be found in John Wilson Croker's letter to O'Meara (dated as above) apprizing him of his removal. See Blackwood's Magazine, xii, 704. The whole story will be found detailed at length in O'Meara's publications and in the other authorities to which we are about to refer the reader. After was extended by the enlagy of Lord Byron:

"The stiff surgeon who maintained his cause
Hath lost his place and gain'd the world's applause."

The "anonymous pamphlet" (vindicatory of Sir Hudson Lowe) to which O'Meara responds in the above work is criticized with great severity in the Edinburgh Review, Exiti. 18-170, whilst O'Meara is commended in the highest terms. 7. Napoleon in Exile, or A Voice from St. Helena: The Opinions and Reflections of Napoleon on the Most Important Events of his Life and Government, in his own Words, 1822, 2 vols. 8vo. This work was sold with great rapidity: at least five eds. were called for; and soveral eds, have been pub. in America. The critics, as sexual, were divided: the Edinburgh Reviewers defended it vigorously; the London Quarterly (in the person of John Wilson Croker) and Blackwood's Magazine (speaking through Christopher North) assailed it furiously. No wonder that it sold well.

"All I can say is," says Blackwood, in the Nortes Ambrosianse Beckmore, 1822, "the more the Sook is abused the better it sails. I think there is never an hour but I hear it called for. It has had as great a run as the Cook's Oracle ever had."

Again: "Nonte. "Hoge.

Again: "Rows." Don't read it. Hogg. It's a piece of mere trush." How. 'Odi I thought I saw some commondations o't in the Magazine. [See vol. xii. 358.]
"Nowre. 'Yee; but Mr. Croker's letter of 1818 had not been published then: at least, I had not seen it: else I would have soured out the paragraph." Noctes Ambros. Sept. 1822.

See also Noctes Ambros., March, 1828; and Blackw. Maga, xiv. 172.

Mr. Croker's review of Napoleon's Exile will be found in the Lon. Quarterly for October, 1822, xzviii, 219-291; and the vindication of the book and its author in the Edinburgh Review, just referred to, appeared in the No. for June, 1822, xxxvii. 164-204. In the same periodical for May, 1823, (review of the works of Viscount Ebrington and Count Las Cassa on Napoleon,) it is affirmed that

"Mr. O'Meara's work contained a body of the most interesting and valuable information,—information the accuracy of which stands unimpeached by any of the atracks lately made against its author... The details in the count's work and those of Mr. O'Meara mutually support each other."—xxxviii. 494, 499.

Another critic, and one of some importance, occupies in this controversy a middle ground between the two just noted:

"Extremely interesting, though written by a person on whim, by his own shewing, one cannot place much relunce. But he could not have invented Buomaparto's conversations; and, with all allowance for exaggeration and party-spirit and private matice, it is a grievous tale. The despot of Enrope reduced to such a narrow theatre of petty squabbles is pitcons. Such a choice of a governor over such a prisoner was unfortunate, to say the least of it. The most high-born good breeding, the most refined good nature, could hardly have sufficed in such a situation."—Twiffile of a Man of the World, Oct. 22, 1822: Lon. Gent. Mag., Dec. 1849, 564.

It is but fair in this connexion (for we do not profess to belong to either party in any of these controversies) to refer the reader to the Letters and Journals of Sir Hudson Lowe, 1853, 3 vols. 8vo, noticed on p. 1136, ante. This sexuals quastio, however, can hardly be satisfactorily disposed until the publication of another journal kept by O'Meara at St. Helena, and left by him to his friend Mr. Mailliard, now of Bordentown, New Jersey, late private secretary to Joseph Buonaparte. This MS. contains much valuable matter still unknown to the world and calculated to deeply interest all students of political history. Of Napoleou's confidence in the veracity of his favourite medical attendant we have the most unequivocal testimony: "Je prie mes parens et mes amis de croire tont ce que le Docteur O'Meara lour dira relativement à la position où je me trouve et assentimens que je conserve. S'il volt ma bonno Louise, je la prie de permettre qu'il lui baise la main.

"Le 25 Juillet, 1818."

In addition to the authorities already cited, refer to Lon. Gent. Mag., Aug. 1836, 219, Oct. 1836, 434, April, 1854, 368. At the sale of O'Meara's effects, (he died at his 180. At the Edgeware Road,) which occurred on the 18th and 19th of July, 1836, a few lines in Napoleon's handwriting sold for cleven guineas; a lock of his hair, for £2 10s.; one of his teeth, extracted by O'Meara, for seven guineas and a half; and the instrument with which is twee averaged. it was extracted, for three guiness.

-90 Opic, Amelia, 1769-1953, the daughter and only child of James Alderson, M.D., of Norwich, of which city she was a native, lost her mother in 1784, and, succeeding to her place as entertainer of the ductor's literary and musical guests, was carly introduced to the society of which she was destined to become so distinguished an ornament. Her taste for letters thus stimulated by example, she soon ventured to contribute proso and poetical compositions to the columns of the (Norwich) Cabinet, the London Magazine, and other periodicals of less pretensions; and she even went so far as to publish anony mously a novel, bearing the excellent title of The Dangers of Coquetry. This moral production may have done much good, but ecitainly attracted little notice and perhaps less applause. In 1798 she married John Opic, the painter, and, on his death in 1807, returned to Norwich, where she remained unmarried for the rest of her life. In 1825 she renounced the Unitarian tenets in which she had been educated, and became a member of the Society of I riends,- adopting the girb, though not all the peculiar opinions, of that religious community In all the relations of life she was truly amiable, and did not confine her benevolence of disposition to her immediate circle of friends. In his Colloquies on Society, (1829, 2 vols. 8vo.) Southey instances (without naming them) Mis Try and Mis. Opic as women prepared by charitable cuthus us to take the lend in esta-blishing societies for improving hospitals, &c., and, in a letter written shortly afterwards to Mrs. Opic, the author remarks,

"We cannot." remarks a late eminent critic, "place Mrs. Opic so high in the scale of intellect as Miss Edgeworth; nor are her tales, though perfectly unobjectionable on the score of morality, calculated to do so much good. They are too fine for common use, and do not aim at the correction of errors and follies of se extensive and fundamental a nature. She does not reason so powerfully; and she is not sufficiently cheerful: indeed, she is too pathelic to be read with much advantage to practical negality. Her writings, however, are very amistle and very beautiful, and exhibit virtuous emotions under a very graceful aspect. They would do well to form a woman that a gentleman should fall in love with, but can be of no great use in training ordinary mortals to ordinary duties."—Lord Jepper: Fine. "Orme, inferior to no English historian in atyle and power of painting, is minute even to tridionances. In one volume he allots, on an average, a closely-printed quarte page to the events of every forty-eight hours. The consequence is that his narrative, though one of the most anthentic and one of the most finely written is one language, has never been very popular and is now scarcely ever read."—Lord Macaday's Essays, 1854, ii. 445: from Edin. It seems a pity to spoil so good a story, but our duty as a bibliographer will not permit us to allow our readers to be so deceived. The voluminous edition of Caryl on Job, to which Mr. Hazlitt refers, is in 12 vols. small quarto, not "folio." The folio edition is in two vols. only. Now, it will not require much reflection to perceive that six foot of folios would be too short a railroad for a large man, and that eleven quartos, diversified with eleven breaks, would be too dangerous a mode of conveyance for a cautions man. Besides, if Mr. Orton was obliged to use so much ingenuity to get down-stairs before dinner, the question in surally occurs. How did he manage to get up-stairs after di mor? for Hazlitt certainly insinuates a too sedulous deve ion to the pleasures of the table. But the author of Tal o-Talk-the title is not without significance--bad no partiality for divines; and therefore his story is liable to partiality for a use suspicion.

This volume, pub. whilst the author was still in London, but containing a number of poems written at the ages of thirteen and fourteen, was received with great favour by the English critics: The Literary Gazette, Monthly Chronicle, Court Journal, Court and Ladies' Magazine, La Belle Assemblée, and Times, each had something to say in its praise. The position in literary society which, through the influence of Mr. Rogers, Mrs. Norton, and other admirers of her own and her husband's talents, Mrs. Osgood had already secured, was confirmed by this evidence of her poetical abilities. The volume was briefly noticed at home in the North American Review for January,

"The poems in this volume," remarks the reviewer, "are mostly of the kind called fugitive. They are marked by the usual defects of poems of this class; but the defects are compensated by more than the usual merits and beauties found in them. In fact, these hasty productions of our countrywoman show uncommon liveliness of fancy, a ready and flowing style, and very happy descriptive powers"—200–270.

mangaret sarah Fuller, a daughter of Mr. Timothy Fuller, member of the National Congress, was h. at her father's residence, Cambridge, Massachusetts, May 23, 1810, and perished—with her husband, child, and a number of other passengers—in the wreck of the ship Elizabeth, on the teach of Fire Island, June 16, 1850. Miss Fuller was distinguished at a very early age for her knowledge of the Greek and Latin classics, her sujoyment of the lucubrations of Goeths, Schiller, Tieck, and Richter, her conversational fluency, and her remarkable power of communicating her literary enthuriasm to her companions. In 1836 abe became a teacher of Latin and French in Mr. Alcot's school in Boston, and in the intervals of her sngagements instructed a class of young ladies in French, therman, and Italian. In the next year she assumed the responsible position of principal teacher in the Greene Street School at Providence; but this connexion was not of long duration. In 1839 she established in Roston a species of connermatione, which soon attracted considerable species of conservations, which soon attracted considerance attention and seems to have afforded great gratification to the literary ladies, married and single, of that learned capital. In 1840 and '41, she discharged the duties connected with the editorship of The Dial, the medium through which her friend Mr. Emorson communicated many of his philosophical reveries to the public. In 1848 Miss Fuller travelled for some time in the West, and gave the meanity of his philosophical revenies to the public deals and the second of the s the results of her observations in a volume entitled Summer on the Lakes. In the next year she resided in the city of New York, as a contributor to the Tribune, and published in that paper many critical articles, a portion of which have been since reprinted in her Papers on Literature and Art. (See No. 5, post.) She sailed for Europe in 1846, and, after an introduction to many of the most prominent literary celebrities of England and to Madame George Sand, of Paris, she reached Rome in 1847. In December, 1847, she was married to the Marquis d'Ossell. On the 17th of May, 1850, accompanied by her husband and child, she sailed from Loghorn for New York. The melancholy catastrophe by which so many of the "homeward bound" were suddenly summoned to the spirit-land has been already noticed. A monument to the Ossoli family, designed and executed by Mr. Thomas Carew, an artist of Boston, was creeted on Pyrola Path, Mt. Auburn Cemetery.

We have We have before us five commendations of this volume, of which we subjoin one or two:

"We need do little more than tell our readers that a well-filled volume has been published of the Thoughts at Home and Abroad of Margaret Fuller Oscoli, a high-natided woman, with whom it is a privilege to be brought into sympathy through any collection of her writings."—Lon. Examiner.
"They (the Letters from Italy) have indeed a double value.—a value not only biographical, but historical. . . . It will bring those sweats nearer to the imagination of the ordinary reader, and help him to make a picture of what has hitherto perhaps been a rough diagram in its mind; and to the historian in search of materials it is likely to contribute some valuable ton hes."—Lom. Otway, Thomas, 1651-1685, a son of the Rev.
Hamphrey Otway, Curate of Trotton, and subsequently Rector of Woolbeding, Sussex, was a native of the latter place; oducated at Christ Church, Oxford; went to London, and made his appearance on the stage without success; com-menced dramatic authorship as a means of livelihood, and produced two plays which have survived, and more which progression was referred by the same forgotton. His first play—Alcibindes, a Tragedy—was performed in 1675; Don Carlos, a Tragedy, took the town by storm in 1676; Titus and Berenice, a Tragedy, a translation from Rapin, was pub. in 1677; and the Cheats of Scapin, a Farce, from Molière, in the same year. To these succeeded Friendship in Fashion, a Comedy, 1678; The Orphan, a Tragedy, in 1680, (taken from Robert Tailor's play The Hog hath Lost his Pearl;) Caius Marius, a Tragedy, (partly borrowed from Romen and Juliel, in the same year; Venice Preserved, or The Plot Discovered, a Tragedy, in Feb. 1680-81; The Soldier's Fortune, a Comedy, First Part, 1681; The Atheist, or The Second Part of the Soldier's Part, 1681; The Athent, or the second Part of the Souther Fortune, 1684. His only other publications were The Poet's Complaint of his Muse, or a Satire against Libels, a Poem, 1689, 4to; and Windsor Castle, a Monument to Charles II., 1684, 4to. In the year after his death was pub. History of the Triumvirate, trans. from the Freuch, 1686, 8vo; Heroic Friendship, a Tragedy, 1719, 4to, has been attributed to him, but without foundation. A collective ed. of his Works was pub. in 1712, 2 vols. 12mo; another in 1718, 2 vols. 12mo; another in 1757, 3 vols. 12mo; another in 1768, 8 vols. 12mo; another in 1812, 2 vols. 12mo; and the last in 1813; 3 vols. 12mo. Oppuy's talents secured him friends and his plays brought him money; but he seems to have derived but Hitle benefit from either. The Earl of Plymouth procured Risks benefit from either. The Earl of Plymouth procured blue a cornet's commission in a military force sent to Flanders; but the poet soon returned to London "in extreme indigence." It was reported that his death was caused by shelting, in his cause haste to swallow a mouthful of roil which cause just in time to save him from starvation. According to another version, (see Spence's Anerdotes,) "he died of a force caught by violent pursuit of a third that had rebed one of his friends."

We add some other opinions.

The Orphan.

"This is one of the few plays that keep possession of the stage, and has pleased for almost a century, through all the vicisations of dramatic fashion. Of this play nothing now can easily be said. It is a domestic tragedy drawn from middle life. Its whole power is upon the affections; for it is not writton with much comperhension of thought or elegance of expression. But, if the heart is interested, many other beauties may be wanting, yet not be missed."

"I will not defend avery thing in his 'Venice Preserved;' but I must bear this testinony to his memory,—that the passions are truly touched in it, though perhaps there is somewhat to be desired both in the grounds of the mand in the height and elegance of expression. But nature is there,—which is the greatest beauty."—Durbers: Prof. to Du Fresnoy's Art of Puinting, 1095, 4to.

"A tragedy which still continues to be one of the favourites of the public, not withstanding the want of morality in the original design and the despicable scenes of vile comedy with which he has diversified his tragic action. . . The work of a man not attentive to deceney nor zealous for virtue, but of one who conceived forcibly, and draw originally, by consulting nature in his own breast."—DR. Joursoys: Islic of Choosy.

"The awful suspense of the situations, the conflict of duties and passions, the intimate honds that units the characters together and that are violently rent assunder like the parting of soul and body, the solemn march of the tragical events to the fatal catastrophe that winds up and closes over all, give to this production of Otway's body, the solemin march of the tragical events to the latin catastrophie that winds up and closes over all, give to this production of Otway's Muso a charm and power that bind it like a spell on the public mind and have made it a proud and hasparable adjunct of the English stage. Overall is named among the translators of the Bible, and wrote that portion of the Catechism of the Church of England which regards the sacraments. Camden styles him a "prodigious learned man." Wood tells us that he had the character of being the best scholastic divine in the English nation; Smith colebrates him for his distinguished wisdom, crudition, and plety; Bishop Montague affirmed that Vossius's Pelagian Bishory was compiled out of Overall's collections; and the learned Bishop Cosin (his former secretary) calls himself Overall's scholar, declares that he derived all his knowledge from him, and in the inscription on his monument styles him "Vir unde quaque doctissimus, et omni encomio major."

Overbury, R. W. Jesuits, Lon., 1846, fp. 8vo. Overbury, Sir Thomas, 1581-1613, a son of Nicholas Overbury, boucher of the Middle Temple, was a native of Unington, Warwickshire, and educated at Queen's College, where he took the degree of B.A. in 1598. After a short application to the study of the law in the Middle Temple, he travelled for some time on the Continent, and there contracted that taste for a life of fashion and display which was destined to prove his ruin. Whilst ou a visit to Scotland in 1601, he made the acquaintance of a page in the service of the Earl of Dunbar.—Ker, or Carr, afterwards Earl of Somerset,—accompanied him to London, shared for a time in his miscalled "good fortune," and in 1613 fell a victim to the baseness of his friend and Has revenge of his friend's mistress,—the Countess of Hasex,—whose desire to become the wife of her paramour had been thwarted by Overbury. An authentic history of this melancholy affair will be found in a valuable work, recently published, ontitled The Great Oyer of Poisoning: the Trial of the Earl of Somerset for the Poisoning of Sir Thomas Overbury, in the Tower of London, and various matters connected therewith, from contemporary MSS., by Androw Amos, Esq., Lou., 1846, 8vo.

Fuller says that Overbury

"attained to be a most accomplished gentleman, which the happiness of his pen both in poetry and prose doth declare. In the latter he was the first writer of characters of our nation, so far as 1 have observed."—Worthies of Eng., ed. 1840, i. 563.

the Microcosmography of Bishop Earle (see p. 539, ante):

"The Microcosmography is not an original work in its plan or mode of execution: it is a close initiation of the Characters of Sir Thomas Overbury. They both belong to the favourite style of apophthegm, in which every sentence is a point or a witticism. Yet the entire character so delineated produces a certain effect: it is a Dutch picture, a Gerard Dow, somewhat toe claborate. Earle has more natural humon than Overbury and bits his mark more neatly; the other is more satirical, but often abusive and vulgar. The Fair and Happy Mikmahl, often quoted, is the text of his Characters. The wit is often trivial and flat; the sentiments have nothing at them general or worthy of much remembrance; praise is only due to the graphic skill in definating character. Earle is as clearly the better as Overbury is the more original writer."—Lit. Hist of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iil, 154.

The True Churchman Ascertained; or, An Apology for those of the Regular Clergy of the Establishment sometimes called Evangelical Ministers; occasioned by soveral Modern Publications, York, 1801, 8vo; 1808, 8vo. This work elicited a reply by Charles Danbeny, D.D., (p. 477, aute.) entitled Vindiciae Ecclesiae Anglicanae, Bath, 1803, 8vo. It was also objected to by the British Critic, vols. xxi. and xxii., and by the author of Zeal without Innovation, 1808; and exceptions were taken to portions of it by the Christian Observer. comments of the last-named periodical were responded to in Four Letters to the Editor of the Christian Observer; being a Reply to that Author's Occasional Strictures on the True Churchman Ascertained, by John Overton, Lon., 1805, 8vo. On the other hand, Bishop Horsley calls The True Churchman Ascertained "a work unanswered and un-answerable;" and the Rev. Charles Simoon, in his Helps to Composition, refers, as the exact statement of his opinions, to "that invaluable book entitled The True Churchman Ascertained, by the Rev. Mr. Overton, of York."

We quote some further opinions: Lt is powerfully written; and I think that he makes good his cause, that the Evangelical Trackers, as they are called, adhere to the dectrines and retain the real of the Church of England as ori-

the dectines and retain the real of the Church of England as originally established, and as still manifest in its Articles, Liturgy, and Homilies; and that those who call themselves Rational Divines are the true secretes from both,"—(Green's) Diary of a Lover of Lit.: Lon., Gent. "The report of Dr. Owen is elegant in its typography and illustrations and able in its science. The author—among the first of American geologists—has contributed in his Report very largely to our knowledge of the rocks and fossils of the West and to the general progress of Geological Science. The volume gives elaborate descriptions of the geological formations of the Upper Mississippi, taking up the several rocks in order, describing their features, materials, fossils, range, extent, and economical bearing."—Silliman's Journal, March. 1863.

Owen's epigrams were as much admired abroad as at home. Borrichius, Lovenyo Cysaro, and Raillet commanded them highly. richius, Lorenzo Crasso, and Baillet commended them highly, and Francisco de la Torre pub. his own epigrammata as a supplement to those of the favoured Briton.—Agudezas de Juan Oven, etc., con Adiciones por Francisco de la Torre, Madrid, 1674, '82, 2 tom. 4to. See Ticknor's Hist of Span. Lit., 1854, iii. 16. Mr. Ticknor remarks of Owen's book, "a volume, it should be noted, so offensive to the Roman Church as to have been early [in 1654] placed on its Index Expurgatorius,"— Ubi supra. And no marvel, when we read the following:
"An fuerit Petrus Rome aub judice lis est;

"An fuerit Petrus Romes and Judice in sei Simonen Rome menor fulses negat."

"Whether at Rome Peter e'r was or no, Is much dispated still, I trow; But Simor's being there, on neither side Was over doubted or denied."

See Chalmers's Biog. Diet., xxiii. 451.

This piece of pleasantry lost the poet the favour and pa-tronage of a rich uncle, whose theological sensitiveness was offended by what he deemed unseemly raillery.

Owen's Epigrammata have lost the reputation they once enjoyed:

"He pub. seven books of epigrams, among which are very few that are genuine. The p-ignant, the lively, the onexpected turn of thought and expression, which has been regularly pursued and carried to a point, is searcely to be found in the compositions of this author. It is evident, from the quick sale of his book, that epigrams could please at this time without the seasoning of Attle salt."—Granger's Boog. Hist. of Eng., ed. 1824, il. 322.

de Savans: Moreri; Niceron, vol. xvi. Owen, John, D.D., 1616-1683, a native of Stadham, Oxfordshire, and a son of Henry Owen, minister of the parish, was educated at New College, Oxford; became chaplain to Sir Richard Dormer and subsequently to Lord John Lovelnce: espoused the cause of the Parliament, and was presented to the living of Fordham, in Essex, from whence he removed to take charge of a congregation at Coggeshall, and about this time renounced Presbytery in favour of Independency; preached the sermon before the House of Commons on the day after the execution of Charles I.; on the 28th February following, preached before Parliament, the chief officers of the army, and Oliver Cromwell, who thenceforth became one of his firmest friends; in 1651, by order of Parliament, made Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1652 became Vice-Chanceller of the University of Oxford,—Oliver Cromwell being at that time Chancellor; succeeded as Vice-Chancellor by Dr. Conant, in 1657, and as Dean of Christ Church by Dr. Reynolds, in 1639; retired to Stadham, and preached to a congregation, and after the Restoration removed to London, where he filled the pulpit from time to time when Non-Conformists were permitted that liberty; in 1673, succeeded the Rev. Joseph Caryl in the charge of the meeting-house in Leadenhall Street, and took his own congregation with him; lost his first wife in Jan. 1676, and about July, 1677, married the widew of Thomas D'Oyley, Esq., of Chischhampton, near Stadham; injured his bealth by excessive devotion to study, and removed for a change of air, first to Woburn, and subsequently to the village of Ealing, where he died, to the great regret of the village of Ealing, where he died, to the great regret of the friends of religion, learning, and virtue, on the 24th of August, 1683. With such moderation had this "Dissenter" comported himself when holding the important poet of Vice-Chancellor of Oxford (never permitting the least annoyance to be offered to the Episcopalians who met weekly for liturgical worship) that he was as much beloved by the Chareching as by his own party. Lord Chareching Class. Churchmen as by his own party. Lord-Chancellor Cleren-don offered him immediate preferment if he would conform to the Church of England; and more than sixty of the nobility of the realm followed his remains to his humble grave at Bunhill-fields,—"the Puritan Necropolis." His death was a becoming termination to a life epent in the active exercise of the duties of a holy faith and unwearied zeal exercise of the duties of a holy faith and unwearied zeal in the service of Gorl and man:

"The first sheet of his 'Meditations on the Glory of Christ' had passed through the prees under the superintendence of the Rev. William Payne; . . and, on that person calling on him to inform him of the circumstance on the morning of the day he died, he exclaimed, with uplifted hands and eyes looking upward, 'I am glad to hear it; but . O brother Payne! the long-wished-for day is come at last, in which I shall see that glory in snother mannet than I have ever done, or was capable of doing, in this world."

Thus lived, thus died, and thus was baried, John Owen, "The Great Dissenter," a man of such profound learning and elevation of character that even the narrow-minded and ill-natured Authory Wood, who never attempts to con-ceal his contempt for Low-Churchmen, Non-Conformists, and republicans, rebukes his loyalist brethren sharply for their strictures on a character too lofty for them to comprehend, and declares from his own personal knowledge that Owen was a person well skilled in the tongues, rabbinical learning, Jewish rites and enstems: he had a great command of his English pen, and was one of the most gented and fairest writers who have ever appeared against the Church of England, as handling his ever appeared against the Church of Engane, as meaning an adversaries with far more civil, decent, and temperate language than many of his flery brethren, and by confining himself wholly to the cause without the unbecoming mixture of personal slanders and reflection."—Atten. Oxon., Bliss's ed., iv. 102, q. v. for evidence of the truth of this assertion.

Dr. Owen was the author of more than eighty publica-tions, all theological: sixty-seven were pub. in his lifetime, from 1642-82, and seventeen between 1683 and 1760, both inclusive. Of these, seven were in folio, thirty-nine in quarto, eighteen in octavo, and sixteen in 12mo. Of these publications, (of which nine are separate sermons,) four folios were consecutive portions of the Exposition of the Hebrews; two octaves were the two Parts of the Me-ditations on the Glory of Christ; a volume of Sermons and Tracts, 1721. fol., contains some pieces already republished; and it is probable that a number of sermons were published more than once in different volumes of the series of eighty publications referred to above. When the folio vol. of Sermons and Tracts was pub. in 1721, it was intended to issue in uniform volumes a complete edition of Owen's Works, and 375 subscribers were obtained for the series. The project, however, was abandoned; and it was not until 1826 that a collective edition of the works of the Great Puritan were given to the world. It was pub. in 20 vols. 8vo, London, under the editorial supervision of the Rev. Daniel Russell, a Dissenting minister in the vicinity of London, and prefaced by the Rev. Wm. Orme's Memoir of the Life and Writings of the Author, making 21 vols. in all. This edition, for which 346 subscribers were obtained, at £12 12s., in which many old errors are perpetuated, does not contain the Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the GEOAOFOYMENA HANTOAAHA give de Natura, Ortu, Progressu, et Studio, Verm Theologiae, and de Matira. Ortal Progressa, e. Statio, veria i according and some sermons of Owen's, —first published in 1854, in Goold's edition, to be noticed hereafter. There was generally sold with it the 2d cd. of the Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews, edited by James Wright, Edin., 7 vols. Svo.

"It was a real service to the Church to have his works collected as they are (including the Exposition of the Epistle to the Ho-brews) in 28 vols. 8vc; and they will furnish the atadent with ample defence of the gospel against its various enemics."—Bickeratelli's C. S., 1844, 268.

But a far greater service was rendered by the publishers and editor of the Rev. Wm. II. Goold's (of Edinburgh) edition, Edinburgh, 1850-55, 24 vols. 8vo, pub. at (£4 18s. 9d.) less than half the price of the cd. of 1826, and worth, all things considered, about as much again. The arrangement is as follows:

Posthumous Sermons, first published in 1854, together with Three Discourses published in 1798; XVIII.-XXIV. An Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

In this excellent edition many typographical errors, some of which were inherited by the edition of 1826 from previous blunders, have been corrected; the punctuation has been thoroughly revised; the Scripture references and the most important quotations from the Greek and Latin Fathers have been verified and collated, and, where faulty, Fathers have been vermed and cointed, and, where langly, rectified. We have before us commendatory notices of this edition by the North British Review, Kitto's Journal, Evangelical Christendom, English Prodyterian Messenger, Christian Times, Protestant World, Raptist Magazine, Non-Conformist, Banner of Ulster, British Banner, Scottish Evangelical Magazine, Scottish Congregational Magazine, Scottish Chardian, and Rdin. Magazine, Scottish Pross, Scottish Quardian, and Edinburgh Witness. From the first-named of these we extract a few lines:

As North British Reviewers, we congratulate our country on "As North British Reviewers, we congratulate our country on having produced this beautiful reprint of the illustrious Puritan; and, from the fact that they have offered it at a price which has introduced it to four thousand libraries, we must regard the publishers as benefactors to modern theology. The editor has conscerated all his learning and all his industry to his labour of love; and, by all accounts, the previous copies needed a reviser as careful and competent as Dr. Godd. Dr. Thousson's memoir of the author we have read with singular pleasure. It exhibits much research and a fine appreciation of Dr. Owen's characteristic excellencies, and its tone is kind and enholic. Such reprints, rightly used, will be a new era in our Christian literature. They can scarcely fait to intensify the devotion and invigorate the faculties of such as read them.... The works of Owen are an exhaustless magazine,"—wd. xcl., 1851. d. xvi., 1881.

We proceed to notice some of the best-known of Owen's works and give the dates of their first publication.

nianisme, 1642, 4to. New ed., revised and corrected by S. Burder. This is his first work.

"Owen's Display is a barrier raised against prevailing opinions. Each chapter contains a statement of the Arminian doctrine on the point discussed, with Owen's answer: while at the end of each chapter the Arminian doctrine is more briefly stated in the language of some Arminian writer, and confronted in opposite columns by passages of Scripture."—Thomswis Life of Owen.

"It became so popular as to produce the author very general respect, and is still indeed considered a very able performance, but at that time was thought particularly seasonable.—Arminianism, and the steps Archbishop Laud took to encourage such opinions, having engaged the attention of all who meditated the chaptes or reformation in church and state which afterwards followed."—Biog. This is the most valuable exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews ever published, written in 1824.] The preliminary exercitations, which occupy the first two volumes of the octave edition fedited by Wright. Edin., 1818-14, 7 vols. 8vo] supply an immense mass of learned information on all the important points of the Jewish controversy. The exposition is the first properties, and judiciously combines criticism, exposition, and practical instruction. This is the only expository work of any extent published by Owen: but several of his other writings well deserve a careful period for the light they throw on the Scriptires,—such as his Vindicine Evangeliers, has work on the 130th Psalm, and his work on the Spirit. For extended notices of all his writings I beg to refer the teader to (Orme's) Memoirs of the Lafe Writings, and Religious Connexions of John Owen. D. "You astonish me, sir, by your patience. You have accomplished a Herculean undertaking in reading Owen's Preliminary Exercitations. To me it is intolerably heavy and prolix."—Robert Hall's Works, ed. 1853, vt. 126.

Dr. I homson-Owen's latest biographer-attributes this dislike to Owen's writings (of which we shall presently give further evidence) to Hall's love of paradox, and his slight acquaintance with the productions of the author of the Exposition; but this is a question which we shall defer to the consideration of the reader. Of all the admirers of Owen none has expressed himself with greater vigour than Dr. John Ryland:

"This book hears the same rank, and has the same relation to the study of divinity, which the 'Principia' of Sir Isaac Newton of my countrymen for their ignorance of this incomparable work,—

St., he is a double Dutchman floundering in a continent of mud."—Greene's Reminiscences of the Rev. Robert Hall, 2d ed., 67, 69.

On another occasion he remarked to Mr. Balmer, (we have already quoted a portion of the conversation,)

"As a reasoner, Dr. Owen is most illogical; for he almost always takes for granted what he ought to proves while he is always proving what he ought to take for granted; and, after a long digression, he concludes very properly with. This is not our concernment, and returns to enter on something still farther from the point."—Hall's Works, ed. 1858, vi. 120.

Mr. Balmer thought a little-and only a little-better of the author thus criticized; but the weight of evidence is greatly against these gentlemen. We have quoted many of these testimonies, and must find room for two or three

"His style resembles St. Paul's: great real and much knowledge

"Spiritual life is the vital energy which pervades the morality and the practice recommended by Owen. It is not the abstraction of a mystical devotion, like that of Fenelon or Law; nor is it the entheistic raptures of a Finzendorf, but the evangolical piety of Paul and the heavenly affection of John. For every practics, mortification, and feeling, Owen assigns a satisfactory, because a scriptural reason. The service which he recommends buniformly a reasonable service; and to every required exertion he brings an adequite and constraining motive. In examining the practical writings of such men as Hall and Taylor and Tillotson, we miss the rich vein of example leaf settiment and that constant reference to the living principle of Christianity which are never lost sight of in Owen. They abound in excellent directions, in rich materials for self-examination and self-government: but they do not state with sufficient accuracy the connexion between gracious influences and its practical recurring the connexion between gracious influences and its practical recurring from integrity, and marking the almost in the correspondence of the skin and the extremities: Owen is the anatomist of the

It is not the least of the merits of Prof. Owen that his sedulous and unwestied application to objects of scientific research has not diverted his attention from objects of a more general interest than attaches to those which claim his hours in the dissecting-room, the library, and the scientific convention. His labours as a member of the Commission of Inquiry into the Realth of Towns, of the Commission of Inquiry into the Health of the Metropolis, and of the Commission of Inquiry into Smithfield Market, and his active participation in the establishment and operations of the Great Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations in 1851, have added the honourable title of philanthropist to the many distinctions with which Science has delighted to honour her favourite

In 1848 he received the Royal Medal, and in 1851 son. the Copley Medal of the Royal Society. Oxford has con forred upon him the degree of D.C.L., and Edinburgh that of LL.D. The King of Prunsia selected him in 1851 to succeed the celebrated Corsted as Chevalier of the Order of Merit. Other foreign countries have united in scknowledgments of his eminent success in promoting the developments of science by which all have profited; and at home he is becoured by a complimentary pension from his Government, and her Majesty has granted him a residence in one of the royal houses in Richmond Park In 1836 Professor Owen married the only daughter of his fellow-curator, Mr. Clift, by whom he has a son living.

his excellence, or who has more contributed to extend that science of which the baron was so distinguished a louder, than Professor Owen,"—Mactheum's Memors of Alexandry, 1863, it 222.

Mr. MacHwain, himself a surgeon, gives us the correct version of a story which will bear ropetition;

"A scadning man brought a piece of boue, about three or four inches in length,—as he said, from New Zealand,—and offered it for said at one or two museums, and, amongst others, at the College of Surgeons. We shall not here detain the reader by telling all that happened. These things are often brought with intent to decrive and with false allegations. Most of those to whom the lone was submitted dismissed it as wouthless, or manifested their incredulity: automate other gressos, some insimance that they had seen beneavery like it at the handon Tavern, regarding it, in fact, as part of an old marrow-home, to which it bode, on a superficial view, some re-semblance. At length it was brought to Prefessor Owen, who, having looked at it carefully, thought it right to investigate it more narrowly; and, after much consideration, his ventured to pronounce his opinion. This opinion from almost anytody else would have been perhaps only langhed at; for, in the first place, he said that the bone (big enough, as we have seen, to suggest that it belonged to a now had belonged to a bird; but, before people had had time to recover from their surprise or other sensation occasioned by this announcement, they were greeted by another assertion yet more startling,—namoly, that is had been a bird without wings.

"Now, we happen to know a good deal of this story, and that the incedulity and doubt with which the opinion was received was too great for a time even for the authority of Professor Ower, entirely to dispel. But mark the truthfulness of a real science; contemplate the exquisity beauty and accuracy of relation in nature! By-and-by a whole skeleton was brought over to this country,—when the opinion of the Professor Ower, when we promise a separati

Paine, Robert Treat, 1773-1811, a son of Judge Robert Treat Paine, and a native of Taunton, Massachusetts, graduated with great distinction at Harvard College in 1792, and subsequently divided his attention between the theorems the matter of the law the college. between the theatres, the practice of the law, the editor's table, and the composition of poetry. From October, 1794, to 1797, he owned and edited The Federal Orrery, a semiweekly, established by his own enterprise. Among his publications are: The Invention of Letters, a Poem delivered in Cambridge on the Day of the Annual Commencement, Bost., 1795, 8vo; The Ruling Passion, an Occasional Poem, spoken at Cambridge before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, 1797, 4to; an Oration, July 17, 8vo, 1799; Eulogy on Washington, Newburyport, 1860, S. S. His contemporaries paid well for his poetry: $1500 for the Invention of Letters; $1200 for the Ruling Passion; $750 for the song, of seven stanzas, estitled Adams and Liberty. The poet's Christian name was originally Thomas; but, as this was also the designation of a famous polemical writer, not distinguished for his admiration of Christianity, the subject of our notice obtained the legislative sanction to take the name of his father. A collective ed. of his Works in Verse and Prose, with a Skotch of his Life, was pub. by Charles Prenties, in 1812, Boston, Svo. This vol. was reviewed in the General Reportory and Review, by Willard Phillips. A later biographical notice of Mr. Paine, in Dr. Allen's American Biographical Dictionary, was reviewed unfavourably by a literary gen-tleman of Boston, (Sigma, i.e. Lucius M. Sargent,) in the Transcript of that city, in June and July, 1857.

"A proce writer and a poet; one whose language, two or three times during his life, soes laspiration. . . We think very well of his genius, but humbly of his understanding. The song 'Adams and Liberty' was written by him. We know of no other tolerable song—except one by Dr. Perelval—that ever was written by an American."—John Neal. *American Writers, No. V.: Blacke. Mag., Feb. 1825, 188.

"Robert Treat Palme of Boston, who fell so early and se much lamented, gave promise of high attainment in the line of lyric and patriotic odes, some of his citusions of that sort, called forth on particular occasions, not having been since surpassed. . Mr. Paine—had he known and improved his powers—would have proved a poet in the high and appropriate sense of the word."—REV. Theorny Fliny: The Lit. of the U. States: Lon. Athea., 1835, 817.

"There was no freshness in Paino's writings; his subjects, his characters, his thoughts, were all commonplace and familiar. His mind was fashioned by books, and not by converse with the world. He had a brilliant fancy, and a singular command of language; but he was never content to be simple and natural. He endeavouted to be magnificent and striking; he was perpetually searching for conceits and extravagances; and, in the multiplicity of his illustrations and ornaments, he was unintelligible and tawdry. From no other writer could so many instances of the false sublime be selected. He never spoke to the heart in its own language."—Grissoold's Poets and Detry of America, 16th ed., 1855, 76.

"Robert Treat Paine was the poet of his day, and in that day onthneiastically admired. I remember hearing what were thought the great sums of money paid for his poems. He was then praised beyond his merits, and now his actual merit is forgotten."—Theoreticus Parsons: Memori of Chief-Justice Parsons, 1850, 136.

Paine, Thomas, Jan. 29, 1736-June 8, 1809, a native of Thetford, county of Norfolk, England, was a son of a stay-maker, a member of the Society of Friends or Quakers, and followed his father's occupation, first at home and subsequently in London, Dover, and Sandwich, Kent. At the last-named place he married, in 1760, the daughter of an exciseman; obtained himself a place in the Excise; became an assistant schoolmaster in London; again entered the Excise Office, from which he was dismissed in 1774; made the acquaintance of Benjamin Franklin, and was by him encouraged to emigrate to America; settled at Philadelphia early in 1775, and became editor of Aitken's Pennsylvania Magazine. 1776 he served as a volunteer in the army, and in Jan-uary of the same year, at the suggestion of Dr. Rush, he wrote and pub. (Phila., 8vo) his Common Sense,—for which the Legislature of Ponnsylvania voted him £500. The University of the same province made him M.A.
The American Philosophical Society elected him a member; and in April, 1777, by a vote of Congress, the Committee of Foreign Affairs secured his services as clerk.

The new secretary, however, made so liberal a use of his The new secretary, however, made so liberal a use of his efficial secrets in an excited controversy with Silas Denne, that the committee became convinced that the pen was held by too "ready" a "writer," and Mr. Paine lost his situation in January, 1779. The successful stroke of Common Sense, of which the sale was not less than 100,000 copies, (also repub., with omissions, London, 1774), was followed by the eighteen numbers of The American Crisis, (Phila., Dec. 19, 1776-April 19, 1783; Lon., 1819, 8vo.) which no doubt tended to keep alive the nationitie spirit of the Revolutionists. In 1780 he was patriotic spirit of the Revolutionists. In 1780 he was appointed Clerk to the Assembly of Pennsylvania, and in the next year accompanied Colonel Laurens to France for the parpose of aiding in the negotiation of a loan, which was satisfactorily arranged; and, on Paine's re-tiring in 1785, he was rewarded by a donation from Con-gress of $5000 and the confiscated estate of Frederic Davoc, a royalist, near New Rochelle, in New York, consisting of 500 acres of good land and a large stone house. In 1787 he again went to France, and made an unsuccesaful effort to enlist the patronage of the Academy of Sciences on behalf of a plan for the construction of iron bridges. Determined to carry out his project, he formed an unfortunate connection with an iron-founder at Rotherham, Yorkshire. In 1791 he published at London the Man,—intended as an answer to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution. The second part of Paine's vigorous production was proceeded against as "a false, scandalous, malicious, and seditious libel," and the suthor, sithough eloquently defended by the Hon. Thomas (afterwards Lord) Erckine, was declared guilty. Escaping to France, be took his seat as a member of the French National Convention, to which he had been elected by the department of Calais; and when the great question of the life or death of Louis XVI, was to be decided, Paine voted for his imprisonment during the war, and the subsequent banishment to America. Towards the his subsequent banishment to America. Towards the close of 1793 he was excluded from the Convention as a foreigner, (in fact, he had been duly naturalized;) and in December of that year, by order of Robespierre, he was committed to the Luxembourg, and remained a prisoner for eleven munths,

The first part of his Age of Reason, finished shortly before his arrest, was committed to the custody of Joel Barlow, and pub. in Londou and Paris in March, 1791, 8vo, (dated Luxembourg, Sth Pluviose;) the second part, composed in prison, was published in Paris and London, Dec. 1795, 8vo. A third part was also published. New add of the whole culture of the Carlinia NAS. In 1706. ed. of the whole, enlarged by Carlile, 1818. In 1796 Paine excited deep disgust among many of his American admirers, by his insolent Letter to George Washington, President of the United States of America, on Affairs Public and Private, (Phila., 8vo; Lon., 1797, 8vo,) which was answered by Cobbett in his Political Concer, Dec. was answered by Cobbett in his Political Consor, Dec. 1790. In 1802, at his own request to visit America in a government vessel, President Jofferson offered him a passage in the sloop-of-war "Maryland," and he arrived at Baltimore in October of that year. He was not without companions: his first wife had died about a year after marriage; his second had parted from him after three years' experience of wedded life; and he new brought with him to America Madame Bonneville, the wife of a French bookseller, and her two sons. A change of scene and associates worked no reformation in the disgraceful habits which had long distinguished him and his chosen friends in London and Paris. Intemperate, tyrannical, licentious, and profess, a terment to himself and a terror to his household, he left the world without repentance, and exchanged the horrors of a death-bed devoid of hope, and exchanged the borrors of a death-bod devoid of hope, for the infamy of a dishonoured grave. In 1819 Mr. Cobbett is supposed (some doubt was expressed as to the authenticity of the relies) to have carried his bones to Ragland; a good office, for which Mr. Cobbett (p. 339, one); has aiready received our thanks. See Ode on the Bones of the Immortal Thomas Paine, newly translated from America to England by the no less Immortal William Cobbett, Beq., Lon., 1819, ito. By Thomas Rodd, Sonior. Bec, also, Notes and Quer., 1868. Writings were re-issued in the same city, in 1 vol. 3vo, (again, N. York, 1860, 12ms.) Of the fairness of the criticisms on the Bible contained in The Age of Reason, and of the candour of the critic, some opinion may be formed from an extract from the author's account of the circumstances under which the first part of this production was composed:

when the area part of this production was composed:

"I had, besides, neither Bible nor Testament to refer to, though I was writing against both, nor could I procure any, [in Paris;]
notwith-standing which, I have produced a book that no Biblebeliever, though writing at his case, and with a library of Church Books about him, can refute."—Frof. to the Second Fart of the Age of Reusa llow far the author was indebted to Joshua Oldfield's Essay towards the Improvement of Reason, published in 1707, we are unable to decide.

"I have now," remarks Paine, at the close of his labours,—"I have now gone through the Bible as a man would go through a wood with an axe on his shoulder to fell trees. Here they lie; and the Praests, if they can, may replant them. They may, perhaps, sick them in the ground, but they will never make them grow."

The manuscript of the first part of the work was submitted to Dr. Franklin, and his advice to the author has been often quoted. We give a brief extract:

"I would advise you, therefore, not to attempt unchaining the tiger, but to burn this puce before it is seen by any other person, whereby you will save yourself a great deal of mortification from the enemies it may raise you, and perhaps a good deal of regret and repentance. If men are so wicked with religion, what would they be without it?"—B. Frakris.

These words proved indeed prophetic. The "regret and repentance" were thus expressed to an infidel admitr, who was congratulating the author on the publication of the work, shortly after Paine's return to America

tion of the work, shortly after Paine's return to America in 1802:

"I am sorry that that work ever went to press. I wrote it more for my own amusement, and to see what I could do, than with any design of benefting the world. I would give worlds, said he, with great emphasis, 'had I them at my command, had "The Age of Reason" never been published! No, sir; I regret the publication of that work exceedingly. It can never do the world any good, and its sarcastic style will doubtless lead thousands to esteem lightly the only book of correct morals that has ever blessed the world. I would advise you,' said Paine, turning his eye to meet Mr. K.'s, 'not to read that work."

We had intended to prove the folly and immiety of this

We had intended to prove the folly and impiety of this man by the testimony of other witnesses; but what more is needed than this confutation from his own mouth? "I wrote it for my own amusement"! Well saith the Wiss King. "As a madman who easteth firebrands, arrows,

Aing. "As a madman who casteth firebrands, arrows, and death, so is the man that decliveth his neighbour, and saith, Am not I in sport?"

"If any thing can exceed the mischlevous intention of this attack on received religion, and which certainly produced very altraining effects on the minds of many of the lower classes, among whom It was liberally circulated, it was the ignorance of which his answerers have convicted him of every species of knowledge meccessary for a discussion of the kind."—Chalmers's Biog. Dact., xxiv. 26.

Gilbert Wakefield, in his notice of the Second Part of the Age of Reason and its author, declares that "His excess of folly will be lamented by all his friends not estranged, like himself, from shame and modesty, and his enomies will read his outrageous vaunts, united to such an excess of ignorance and supper, with that pleasure which results from a just expression of mingled abhorrence, dorision, and contempt. For my part, his unprecedented infatuation almost strikes are dumb with amazement. I am not acquainted with such a compound of vanity and ignorance as Thomas Paine, in the records of literary history."

of folly and dishonesty on the part of one of its most prominent champions. The wits of the American republic were not idle on the occasion. An epigrammatist of the day embodied the popular sentiment in the couplet,—

"Here lies Tom Paime, who wrote in liberty's defence, But in his 'Age of Reason' lost his 'Commu. Sense,"

"It must soon sink into infamy," predicts William Linn, "and carry his own name along with it. There is nothing new in the performance, save the bold and indecent manner. Indeed, it is provoking to see the Christian religion, after having withstood the roarings of the lion, insulted by the brayings of the ass."—

Discourse on the Rill of Ashit-Christ.

"The time has long since gone by," remarks a modern reviower, "when the name of Paines would throw good and plous men into paraxysms of indignation. No one nowadays reads "The Age of Reason, such is the entire and contemptuous oblivion into which it has failen; nor would any one take the trouble to mutilate a copy of Paine's Works, as was once the fashion, by cutting out, his pages of loathcome infidelity."—WILLIAR E. REED: Life and Character of Thomas Paine: N. Amer. Rev., July, 1843, 1-65,—an excellent paper, a.

We can go a little farther than this. It sounds somewhat oddly to place the author of The Age of Reason in the ranks of Christian propagandists: yet we know of at least two instances where the perusal of his work was the means of persuading the reader of the truth of the doctrine of the inspiration of the Scriptures. Let us bristly refer to one of these cases of anexpected conversion.

At a dinner at Dr. Nicholas Romayne's,—the narrator is our valued friend Dr. John W. Francis, of New York, one of Paine's contemporaries,-

"Pintand chose the occasion to express to Paine his opinion of his infidel writings. 'I have read and re-read,' said Pintand, 'your Age of Reason, and any doubts which I before entertained of the trath of Revelation have been removed by your logic. Yes, sir, your very arguments against Christianity have convinced me of its trith.' 'Well, then,' answered Paino, with a surractic glance 'I may return to my couch to-night with the compolation that I have made at least one Christian.'"—Da. Francis: Old Man Pork, ed. 1858, 140.

We ask nowledge that the second of the examination of

We acknowledge that the result of the examination of the arguments of infidel writers, from the learned sophisms of the aristocratic recluse of Cherbury, to the shallow ribaldry of the stay-maker of Thetford, has had the same effect on our mind which Pintard avowed to Paint himself: a thorough conviction of the inspiration, excel-lency, and inestimable value of the Holy Scriptures. This is our testimony; and may it remain as our epitaph long after we have been summoned to our account before "the Judge of all the carth"!

A book so easily confuted would of course not remain long unanswered: Bishop Watson's and Thomas Scott's responses are now the best-known; but we may add to these names those of J. Auchincloss, Elias Boudinot, John Disney, Samuel Drew, J. P. Estlin, David Levi, W. Macneil, Thomas Meck, Michael Nash, Uzal Ogden, Leba Parter, W. Berkel, W. Berkel, W. Barter, W. Berkel, you maeneth inomas sheek, Michael Ruen. Uzal Oguen. John Padman, Wm. Patten, J. Priestley, T. Shann, David Simpson, Thomas O. Summers, Robert Thomson, Mr. Tytler, W. Wait, G. Wakefield, E. Wallace, and T. Williams, and still leave the list unexhausted.

When Robert Hall was asked his opinion of the Age of Reason, he replied, "My opinion of it, sir? Why, sir, it is a mouse nibbling at the wing of an archangel."

As a political writer, Paine has already come under our notice in our life of Sir James Mackintosh, (pp. 1179, 1180, ante.)

We have no disposition to undervalue his services to the cause of American liberty; but it is only just to say that these services have been vastly overruted. To imagine that a writer who had never seen the American soil before the year 1775, and whose first political publication preceded the Declaration of Independence by only six mouths,—whose emigration to America had been suggested by Franklin in Paris, and whose Common Sense was originated by Rush in Philadelphia,-to dignify this tardy champion with the title of an Apostle of American Liberty would be to employ a figure too bold for chronology and too ludicrous for fiction. In fact, in no country in the world were the mischievous extravagancies already referred to, so startlingly obtruded in The Rights of Man, more vehemently condemned than they were then, are now, and we trust ever will be, in the United States of America.

Jeremy Bentham declares that

United States of America.

Jeremy Bentham declares that

"The theory laid down in the 'Declaration of the Rights of Man' had, in a great measure, produced the crimes of the Reign of Terror;—that none but an eye-witness could imagine the horrors of a state of society in which comments on that Declaration were put forth by men with no food in their beilies, with rags on their backs, and pikes in their hand;"—Sophismes Americains In the Backs, and pikes in their hand;"—Sophismes Americains In the Backs, and pikes in their hand;"—Sophismes Americains in England in 1688; Essuys, Lon., 1854, ii. 64.

"His strong coarse sense and bold dogmatism;" says the biographer of Mackinosh, "conveyed in an instructively popular style, made Paine a dangerous enemy always; but more particularly at a period when the great masses of the middle and lower orders of both countries were to be appealed to."—Life of Sir James Mackinlosh, vol. i. chap. ii.

"His bold speculations and ferce invectives," remarks Sir James himself, "indicated the approach of civi confusion."—Life, etc., vol. ii. chap. iii.

"I seems," exclaimed the indignant Burke, "that all which the beasted wisdom of our ancestors had laboured to bring to perfection for six or seven centuries, is nearly, or altogether, matched in six or seven days, at the leisure hours and sober intervals of citizen Thomas Paine."—Lifers on a Registed Peace; Works of Edmand Burke, ed. 1852, v. 481.

"Paine," says Profesor Smyth of Cambridge, "is a wfiter as distinguished for the superficial view which he takes of the subjects on which he writes, as for the effondery with which he proposes and the ability with which he illustrates his opinions. Indeed, I know no argument so strong against all the democracy."

This good head, however, seems, by the confession of its owner, good head, however, seems, by the confession of its owner, to have been for a long time turned to very little account.

"I spent," he tells us, "the first two years of my under-gradicateship happily, but unprofitably. I was constantly in society,—where we were not immoral, but idle, and rather expensive. It the commencement of my third year, however, after having left the usual party at rather a late hour in the evening, I was awakened at five in the morning, by one of my companions, who stood at my bedside, and said, 'Paley, I have been thinking what a fool you are! I could do nothing profitably were I to try, and can afford the life I lead; you could do every thing, and cannot afford the life I lead; you could do every thing, and cannot of these reflections, and I am now come solemnly to inform you that if you persist in your indolence I must renounce your society.' I was so struck with the visit and the visitor, that I lay in bed a great part of the day and formed my plan."

The excellence of this "ham." and the conscientious

The excellence of this "plan," and the conscientious devotion with which it was adhered to, are best illustrated by the four important productions which have conferred celebrity on the author's name; viz.: 1. The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, 1785, 4to; 1786, 4to; 1790, 2 vols. 8vo. Many edits. 14th ed., 1803, 2 vols. 8vo. Green; Leotures on Palcy, 8vo; Arnowsmith, R. G.; Smith, William, No. 3. The title of this work is hardly justified by its contents:

"The work of Dr. Paley embraces the Principles of Political as well as Moral Philosophy; but, able and judicious as in many respects that portion of the book is, the space allotted to it, being little more than one-third of two modorate-sized and widely-printed octave volumes, shows how far it must be from explaining the whole even of the principles of the science. Of Political Economy it has almost nothing; it only gives the principles of government in their most general form; it makes no application of them to any constitution but that of England; it derives from the constitution of no other country any illustration of them; and it may justly be regarded rather as an illustration of the doctrines of Moral Philosophy, and an appendix to the main body of the work, than as a treatise on Political Science."—Loan Broudham: Polit. Philos., Part 1, 3d ed., 1853, 3l.

but, unaccompanied with a proper qualification, this commendation is calculated to mislead the student. We have We have already expressed the opinion (see Preface to this Dictionary) that Paley's "theory of expediency is radically tionary) that Paley's "theory of expediency is radically unsound;" and we now apply the same comment to his dicts on the Law of Honour, the occasional admissibility of falsehood, and other deviations from the standard of Scripture. "It cannot be denied that Paley was sometimes rather a lax "To cannot be defined that rately was sometimes rather a submoralist, especially on public duties. experience. They are naturally led to lower their precepts to the level of their expectations."—Six J. Mackintosh: Horks, Lon, 1884, i. 189.

"As Sir James Mackintosh justly remarks, all that Paley says in refutation of the principle of worldly honour is hollow and unmeaning. In fact, it is merely one of the commonplaces adopted by satire, and no philosophy at all."—De Quincey's Lit. Remiefa., Bost., 1851, ii. 3:23, n.

"Perhaps the perfection of acuteness appears in Sir James Mackintosh's refutation of Paley upon the law of honour. Rarely has a false idea been more suddenly caused to founder and to show out. At one sling it is dispersed into smoke. . . . It is singular that Sir James, with all his scholaric subtiety, should not have remarked the confusion which Paley and others of his faction make between utility as a test or criterion of morality, and utility as a ground of morality. . . Paley's talents, within lower spheres of speculation, were prodigious. But he wanted every thing that should have fitted him for what is subtlest in philosophy or what is grandest in ethics. Continue to honour the man as the most philosophic amongst the esseptably worldy by making it a chief text of your ethics, and an examination-book for the young aristocracy of England.— The Quincey's Exists on Philos. Writers, &c., Bost., 1864, i. 76, 77, 79.

"Paley's works, while they seem to put virtue in a commonseme form, and place her within reach of everybody, have degraded her from her antique pedestal, and, by lowering the standard, shaken the foundation on which she formerly atoud, and, by making that morality can bending shortality, or allowing that morality can bend, to circumstances,

"The 'Horse Funiture' is remarkably adapted for the profitable exercise of the minds of law-students. It is pronounced by one of the highest authorities upon auch matters, Dr. Whately, to be 'an incomparable specimen of reasoning, [Rhetoric, p. 94, mote,) 5th ed.,]—and of that kind of reasoning, moreover, with which lawyers are peculiarly conversant, and in which they do and ought to exect. . . . Independently of the pre-eminent value and importance of such an undertaking, in a religious point of view, such an interesting and masterly exhibition of logical activeness ought to be familiar to all capable of appreciating and profiting by it."—Warren's Law Studiers, 2d ed., 1845, 224, 220.

Lord Brougham has certainly been amply rewarded for his labours in this important department of science.

"It has given me," he remarks, "a most heartfelt satisfaction to receive many communications from persons both at home and abroad, which mitimated their having been converted from recligious opinions by the 'Commentaries and Illustrations of Paloy, published in 1835 and 1838 [1830]."—Pref. to Lives of the Philos. dences of Christianity, continues:

"The same character belongs to his last and perhaps his most elaborate work, the Natural Theology. Here, too, Paley had his pioueers, as well as his forerunners; but his inimitable skill in arranging and contensing his matter, his peculiar turn for what may be torned 'animal mechanics,' the apnese and the wit of his illustrations, and occasionally the warmth and the solemnity of his devotion, which, by a happy and becoming process, is—

came more animated as he draw meaner to the close of life, stam on this work a character more valuable than originality itself. —Los. Quar. Rev., 12, 307, July, 1813,

Among the books which Paley laid under tribute in the preparation of his Natural Theology, Sir Matthew Hale's Primitive Origination of Mankind, 1677, fol., has been cited; but, we need hardly remark, no one could connect the idea of "originality" with Paley's leading principle.

"The reasoning by which Scerates, in Kenophon's hearing, confluted the little atheist Aristodemus, is exactly the reasoning of Paloy's Natural Theology. Socrates makes precisely the same use of the statues of Polycletus and the pictures of Leuxis which Paley makes of the watch."—Lord Micaulus's Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, ii. 541; from Edin. Rev., Oct. 1840.

But it was not so generally known that even the "use of the watch," a portion of the language used in the illustration, and other parts of the Natural Theology, were borrowed without acknowledgment from Chamberlayne's translation of Bernard Nieuwentyt's Christian Philosopher, (so styled by the translator,) pub. in London, 1718-19, 3 vols. Svo. This fact was pointed out by erax," in the London Athenicum, Aug. 12, 1848, 803. To this article, and to the apologies for Paley (who scknowledges general obligations in his preface) in the same periodical for Sept. 9 and 16 ensuing, we refer the ourious reader. It is but fair to add that the editor of the Atheniqum, and a writer in the Church and State Gazette, decide the case against Paley. See, also, Notices of Paley's Natural Theology, in Albert Barnes's Essays and Reviews, 1855, i. 10, 11; R. Blakey's Old Faces in New Masks, 1859, sm. 8vo; N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1865, 176, 181, (by C. We have now noticed-us proposed-the four works by which Paley's name is best known. He also published several theological tracts, a number of separate sermons, and the following work, which appeared without his name: 5. The Clergyman's Companion in visiting the Sick, 1795; many edits. New and corrected edit., 1839, 12mo. See Dodwell, Wm. This work is extracted chiefly from the works of Jeremy Taylor, Bishop Patrick, Kettlowell, and others. Palcy's prefatory part has been highly commended. In the edit. of 1839 "the antiquated style is corrected and improved throughout, and prayers, one by Dr. Stonehouse and four by Mr. Meyrick, are added to the old collection." An od, of this work, with an Appendix by the Rev. John Bull, was pub. in 1812, 8vo. The last ed. of The Clergymau's Companion was pub. 1844, 18mo.

A collective ed. of Paley's Sermons and Tracts was pub. in 1808, 8vo, and they both have been several times reprinted. In 1825 appeared (then first published) Ser-mons on Various Subjects, edited by the Rev. Edmund Paley, M.A., [son of the nuthor,] Vienr of Easingwold, 2 vols 8vo, Bost., 1827, 8vo. "In the volume better us," remarks the reviewer of the edition of 1808, "we have a collection rather of useful disquisitions on religious subjects, than of unpressive sured orations. We see before us rather a cleat-headed moralist, coolly investigating truth, analyzing and dissecting with skill the subject which he takes in hand, reasoning upon it with an accuracy which all must feel, and stating his teculis in a method which all must understand, than a powerful master of cloquence, endeavouring to work upon the conviction of his heavers, by addressing as well their passions as their understandings, calling to the aid of argument great conceptions, striking imagery, and animated description."—Low. "No reader of Dr. Paley's former works will open his Sermona with any expectation of what we usually call eloquence. We were prepared to expect a number of elaborate, and therefore important, dissertations. We were not apprised that the volume would chiefly consist of the very short and hastily-written disconlines which were composed in the ordinary course of his presistence and excellent. It would be reliculous in us to affect for recommend a volume written by Dr. Paley. It will be extissively read; it is readers will receive many useful and stribling thoughts; and we carnestly wish they may study the May Testament enough to be saved from any significant impression of what we cannot allow ourselves to regard as unimportant

Mr. Bickersteth, an advocate of what is denominated "the Evangelical party of the Church of England,"—we have nothing to do here with the correctness of the term,—numbers Paley among those "who did not held evangelical principles at first, but embraced them afterand considers that he proves this statement by comparing portions of Paley's carlier and later sermons See Bickersteth's Christian Student, ed. 1844, 321, 322.

It is often alleged that Paley's supposed defects in orthodoxy prevented his being raised to the episcopal bench; but those who remember the reference of George III. to "Pigeon Paley" (one of the few bon mots of a very matter-of-fact man) will be inclined to think that the political philosopher was at least in as little favour in high places as the Christian divine. The complaints of Paley's lack of preferment are perhaps exaggerated: he never indeed reached the mitre; but a comfortable parsonage, a well-stocked library, a happy fireside, and £1200 per annum, were not calculated to drive a philosopher to deepair or a divine to enicide. When we consider, too, that the prime minister tried, though without success, to make Pulcy a hishop, whilst Palcy succeeded in making the prime minister a butt, we are disposed to check our lamentations over the disgraceful obscurity of the clerical wit. Sir Archibald Alison's remarks on this subject, however, (Hist. of Europe 1815-1852, chap. v.,) deserve the attention of the reader.

"All the theological works of all the numerous bishops whem he [Pitt] made and translated are not, when put together, worth fifty pages of the Horse Paulins, of the Natural Theology, or of the View of the Evidences of Christianity. But on Paley this all-powerful minister never bestowed the smallest benefice."—LORD MACAULAY: Life of Pitt, in Energe, Brit., 5th ed., xvii. 1859.

Comments on Paley's theological opinions will be found in the Lon. Quar. Rev., il. 82-83, and (by Rev. J. J. Blant) xxxviii. 326-329. He was twice married, first in 1776, and had by his first wife four sons and four daughters. His second wife survived him. His pre-sentation to the valuable living of Bishop Wearmouth was principally ascribed to his excellent answer sent to the Parliamentary Committee against the claims of the slave-dealers, when the subject of the abolition of the slave-trade was about being discussed in the House of

"Johnson and Paley, Locks and Battler, immediately occur as the great masters of moral, metaphysical, and religious instruction,—Locks the votary of truth, and Paley the very gonius of good sense. ... Hist., Lects. XXIV. and XXIX.

"This exculiont writer, who, after Clarke and Butter, ought to be ranked among the brightest ormanents of the English Church in the eighteenth century, is, in the history of philosophy, naturally placed after Tuckor, to whom, with praisesworthy liberality, he owns his extensive obligations. It is a mistake to suppose that he owed his system to Hame,—a thinker too refined, and a writer parkaps too elegant, to have naturally attracted him. . . The satural frame of Paley's understanding fitted it more for business and the world than for philosophy; and he accordingly analyzed with constiterable relieb he few opportunities which the latter part of his life afforded of taking a part in the affairs of his county is a magistrate. . . "In the American papers I see advertised the sixth American edition of 'Paley's Philosophy.' No had sign of American intellect."—Mackintosh's Life, vol. ii. chap. iii.

It would be a difficult matter to reskon up the "American editions of Paley's Philosophy" issued since the date of this entry,—between 1812 and 1870. It is well, however, to quote the cordial tribute to his master of one of Paley's most eminent American scholars:

"There is no mame in the English Church, perhaps, that should stand higher than his; there are few in the vast circles of English literature whose just fame shall be more extensively or permanently recorded."—Rev. ALREST BARNES: Exags and Reviews, 1855, ii. 217; from An Address delivered before the Society of Inquiry in Amberst College, August 21, 1838.

We have seen on a preceding page that of the Philadelphia cd. of Paley's complete works 20,000 copies were printed between 1831 and 1858.

We conclude with a few lines from the last commentator on Palcy:

tator on Paley:

"His mind was essentially English, and English in its best mood. He was not remarkable for his learning, though far from being ill informed; but the bent of his infind was not toward scholarship. He was eminently practical in his ideas; his thoughts, descending from the clouds, ever turned to some object of actual importance in real life. His mind was not of the most clevated cast; and accordingly he made utility the great object of life and necesure of actions. He will never be a favourite, accordingly, with that handful of men who nevertheless alone do great things in the world, who aim at the noble and generous in all things, and let the useful take care of itself. But, while disposition precluded him from rising to the highest rank in literature, which never is to be attained but by the influence of lofty feelings, within his limits, and in a lower sphere, he was very admirable and eminently useful."—Six Archibald Alison: Hist. of Europe 1815—1852, vol. i. chap. v., 1852.

Palfrey, John Gorham, D.D., LI.D., son of John Palfrey, and grandson of William Palfrey, Paymaster-General in the army of the Revolution, was born at Boston, May 2, 1796; graduated at Harvard College in 1815; was ordained to the pastoral care of the Brattle Square Church (Boston) in 1818, and retained this charge until 1831, when he was elected Dexter Professor of Sacred Literature in Harvard University. In 1839 he resigned his professorship, and has since devoted his time and talents to the duties connected with periodical literature, theological treatises, political services, and historical investigations. From January, 1836, to January, 1843, he edited the North American Review, to which between 1817 and 1859 he contributed thirty-one articles; was elected to the General Court of Massachusetts in 1842 and 1843; Secretary of the Commonwealth, 1844-47; a member of the National House of Representatives from Boston, 1847-49; Postmaster of Boston, 1861-66. Dr. Paris was an intelligent and scalous naturalist, and founded the Royal Geological Society of Cornwall, one of the earliest associations of the kind. He also wrote an excellent paper On the Soils of Cornwall, in which he anticipates the modern use of mineral manure. See a notice of Dr. Paris in Lon. Athen., 1850, 1609.

Paris, Matthew, a monk who assumed the religious abit in the Benedictine monastery of St. Alban's in habit in the Benedictine monastery of the history of 1217, and died there in 1259, is known by his history of the history of t England, entitled Historia Major, which commences with the Norman Conquest and comes down to the date of his desth. It was continued by William Rishanger, a monk of the same abbey. Paris's bistory to the year 1235 may be called a version of the Flores Historiarum of Roger of Wendover; and yet some modern authorities have contended that Paris was really the author of the latter contended that faris was really the author of the latter work. But see, in opposition to this view, the comments of the Rev. H. O. Coxe, who edited the edit of Wendover pub. by the Eng. Hist. Soc., 1841-44, 5 vols. Svo. Even the Flores Historianum of Matthew of Westminster has been, but erroneously, attributed to Matthew Paris. The edits of the Historia Major are—I. Edited by Abp. Parker, Low., fol. II. Tiguri, [Zurich,] 1580, fol. 111. Tiguri, 1606, fol. II. and III. are reprints of 1. IV., edited by Dr. Wm. Wats, q. v., 1640, fol.; 1641, fol.; title as follows:

Mattheoi Paris Monachi Albanenses, Angli, Historia Major, cam Rogeri Wendoveri, Willichmi Rishangeri, authorisque Majori Minorique Historiis collata, cui accesserunt Vitre Offarum et xxiii. Abbatum S. Albani, eta., cum Variis Lectionibus Glossario et Indicibus, edente W. Wats.

This is the edit. generally preferred. V. Paris, 1644, fol. VI. Lon., 1684, fol. This edit. is preferred by Dr. Dibdin (Lib. Comp., 168) to that of 1640, 1641. Giles, 1852-53, 3 vols. fp. 8vo, being vols. xvii., xix., and xxxi. of Bohn's Antiquarian Library. Vols. ix. and xix., 1849, of this Library, consist of Dr. J. A. Giles's trans. of Roger of Wendover's Flowers of History. Among The region of wendowers showers of history. Among Father supposite works (a number are ascribed to him in Bale, and Pite) there are MSS, of an epitome of his initiaty, referred to sometimes as Historia Minor. Bishop Riccibes says that this compandium contains "several giardianiars of note conitted in the larger history."

"To the series of threnicies and Memorials published in England, under the Molla, have just sen, added two rollings of what Arabbishop Parker called the libraria Minor of Matthew Parks, which was called by himself Historia Minor of Matthew Parks, which was called by himself Historia Angierum. The work is edited by the Frederick Madden, and now, for the first time, printed from a very complete copy of it, which is in the handwriting of the author, and is among the MSS. of the Old Royal Collection in the British Masseum. Attention was first called to this text in 1835, by the Rev. Joseph Stevenson, in the notes to his edition of Bir Robert Cray's "Scalacronical." Mr. Stevenson then said of it that it varied so much from the Grester Chronicle printed by Wats, as to assume the appearance of a distinct version, and a version, too, which, in many points, is fuller, stronger, and better than that already given to the public."—Aug. 1866.

Matthew Paris was esteemed by Henry III., and also by the Pope, who sent him on a mission of reformation by the Pope, who sent him on a mission of retormation to Norway, and was noted as a universal scholar. It will be observed that this work was first pub. earlier than Marshall's, and in the same year with Millar's: see Manshall, Sanuel; Millar, John, No. 2; Duer, John, No. 2; Phillips, Willard.

"Mr. Park is entitled to the superior [as compared with Marshall] and lasting merit of being the artist who first reduced the English law of insurance to the beauty and order of a regular science, and attracted to it the rays of foreign genius and learning. . . . He had the advantage of the labours of the whole period of Lord Mansfield's judicial life; and the decisions are collected and digested with repair confounces. scraftling and securacy. of Lord Manshold's Judicial life; and the decisions are collected and digested with great coplousness, crudition, and accuracy. He extracted all that was valuable from the compilations of Malynes, Molloy, Magens, Beawes, and Weskett; and he had the good sense and liberality to eurich his work with the materials of those vast and venerable repositories of commercial learning, the Le Guidon, the foreign ordinances, and the writings of Receive, Bynkershoeck, Valin, Pothler, and Emerigon."—3 Kent, 430; 8th ed., 1854.

"Mr. Park deserves much praise for the judgment, accuracy, and general excellence of his system of the law of insurance... As a collection of authentic cases in the fullest and most accurate form, it still remains unrivalled.... The learned author occaas a confection or authentic cases in the attent and action not actually form, it attli remains unrivalled. The learned author occasionally discusses general principles with a good deal of ability."

with a Memoir of the author, N. York, 1857, 12me.
Purk, Mungo, 1771-1805, first opened his eyes on the world on his father's farm of Fowlshiels, on the banks of the Yarrow, near Selkirkshire. After three years' apprenticeship to Mr. Thomas Anderson, surgeon, of Solkirk, whose daughter Park subsequently married, and three sessions' attendance on the surgical courses of the University of Edinburgh, Park repaired to London, and, through the influence of Sir Joseph Banks, obtained the appointment of assistant surgeon to the "Worcestor," East Indiaman. In that vessel he made a voyage to Sumatra in 1792, returning to England in the following year. In Trans. Linn. Soc., iii. 33, 1794, will be found a paper en-titled Descriptions of Eight New Fishes from Sumars, contributed by our young naturalist. On the 22d of May, 1795, he sailed from England, under the anspices of the African Association, as the successor to Major Houghton, who had died abroad whilst engaged in the exploration of the course of the Niger. After experiencing great hard-ships in his energetic efforts to fulfil the purpose of his mission, he returned to England on the 25th of December, 1797, and was enthusiastically received by men of science and the public at large. The two following years were devoted to a preparation of his narrative,—Travels in the Internal Districts of Africa, &c., with an Appendix, &c., by Major Rennell,—which appeared in 1799, Lon., 4to; also 1800-01, 2 vols. 8vo. This work met with a ready sale, and paid the author handsomely. See RENEELL, Major James, Nos. 4, 10. In 1799 he returned to Selkirk, and married the daughter of his old master, Mr. Anderson; settled as a surgeon at Poebles in 1801; sailed from Portsmouth, Jan. 30, 1805, as commander of a Govern-ment expedition of discovery into the interior of Africa; lost by sickness in about six months 39 out of the 43 Europeans who accompanied him from the Gambia; and Europeans who accompanied him from the Gambia; and was himself drowned in the Niger, probably in December, 1805, whilst attempting to escape from a party of native assailants. In 1816, 4to, was pub. (by Mr. John Whishaw, of Linseln's Inn) The Journal of a Mission to the Interior of Africa, in the Year 1805, by Mungo Park; together with other Documents, Official and Private, relating to the same. Parker, Matthew, August 6, 1504-May 17, 1575, the second Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury, a native of Norwich, was educated at, and became Fellow of, Or Norwich, was educated at, and became Fellow of, Corpus Christi or Bene't College, Cambridge; ordained Deacon in April and Priest in June, 1527; preferred to the deanery of Stoke Clare, Suffulk, 1536; Master of Bene't College, 1544; married to Margaret Harlstone, 1547; Dean of Lincoln, 1552; deprived of his preferments on the accession of Queen Mary, 1553; Archbishop of Cantony, 1550. of Canterbury, 1559. He was realously devoted to the stability of the throne, the promotion of letters, and the furtherance of the Protestant religion, and led an anxious life amidst the war of opinions, political and religious, which agitated his times. Bitterly opposed by the adherents of the Church of Rome, too conservative to please those who desired to unite Geneva and Canterbury, soundly rated by Elizabeth for having dared to take a wife, whom all the arguments for priestly celibacy failed to induce him to forsake, the good archbishop found little happiness in his exalted station. It will be remembered that it was in reference to the solemn act by which he was set apart to this high office that the absurd story of the Nag's Hend Consecration was fabricated. It is unfair to call this a Roman Catholic fiction,—though invented by members of that communion; for a number invented by memoers of that communion; for a number of Roman Catholic writers profess their disbelief of it. Archbishop Parker edited, among other works, the his-torics of Matthew of Westminster, Matthew of Paris, Thomas Walsingham, and Asser's Life of King Alfred, all in folio; The Gospels of the Fower Enangelists, 1571, 4to; and A Saxon Homily on the Sacrament; pub. two translations from the Latin, 1562-87; The whole Psalter trans. into English Metre, 1557, 4to; set forth a Forme of Prayer, 1565, '66, 4to; wrote and pub. A Defence of Priests' Marriages, against Thomas Martin, (see p. 1232, ante,) 1562, 4to; and his name is prominently connected with the following works: 1. The Holie Bible, London, [printed] by Richard Jugge, 1568, fol. This translation was urged by him (in 1565) and undertaken and carried on under his inspection. Of the (at least) 15 translators engaged, eight were hishops: hence this ed. is known as "The Bishops' Bible,"—also called the "Great English Bible." For descriptions of it we refer to Dr. Cotton's Bible." For descriptions of it we refer to Dr. Cotton's List; Dibdin's Ames's Typ. Antiq., iv. 256; Dibdin's Ades Atthorp., i. 66, 67; Dibdin's Lib. (bad edit.:) Accurante Sam. Drake, Lon., 1729, fol. (good edit.) All in Lating The extent of the archbishop's share in this work is a matter of doubt. Perhaps if we say that Rev. Dr. George Ackworth (see p. 34) and Rev. John Josselyn, one of the prelate's "antiquaries," compiled the work under Parker's eye, and principally from his own MSS., we shall come as near to the truth as possible. The book is now very rare: Strype notices only 5; but Dr. Drake found 211 copies,—the most of them imperfect. There is a valuable copy in the Lambeth Library, illustrated by original MSS., which appears to be the same as that original Acco., which appears to be the same at that noticed by Strype as in the possession of Archbishop Sansroft. Bindley's copy was sold for £45. See Dibdin's Ames's Typ. Antiq., iv. 126–130; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 114, 115; Martin's Cat. of P. P. Books, ed. 1854, 1; Lou. Gent. Mag., 1856, ii. 53.

"I need not mention," says Strype, "this admirable book of the Lives of the Archbishope of Canterbury, which he might well style 'the British Antiquities,' there being such a plentiful treasure of choice antiquities collected together."

Nor should we fail to notice the publications of The Parker Society,—a noble monument to the memory of this eminent prelate,—which are composed of the best works of the Fathers and early writers of the Reformed English Church, and other writers of the seventeenth century, including translations of Foreign Reformers and valuable MS, treaties hitherto unpub-lished. Vol. xlix., 1852, 8vo, contains the Archbishop's Correspondence. The complete series, 55 vols. (including vol. of thencral Index) r. 8vo, 8vo, and 12mo, 1841–55, can now be had in cloth for £8 to £9. See Burton's Book-Hunter, Part 4. The archbishop would have highly enjoyed superintending the rarer works of this series for the press; for so great an enthusiast was he in the cause of Bibliomania that, Strype assures us, he kept constantly in his house

"Drawers of pictures, wood-cutters, painters, linners, writers, and book-binders: one of these was Lylye, an excellent writer, that could counterfeit any antique writing. Him the archibishor ensumarily used to make old books compleat."—Life of Turker, all, eac.

He had agents at home and on the continent, picking up rare books and sending them to his library; and "one of these" (to quote Strype, supra) was our eccentric friend Stephen Batman, whose exploits in the Deminia Sampson line we have duly commemorated on p. 141 of this volume. The library there celebrated was left by the archlichop to Corpus Christi College. See NARMITE, JAMER, D.D.

But, if we admire the book-collector, (and we do admire the scal of all intelligent book-collectors,) how shall we adequately reverence the memory of a man of whom Gibbon—not often surprised into rapturous culogiums upon the ciergy—thus speaks:

"Far different from such refermers was the learned and plous "Far different from such references was the learned and pious Matthew Parker, the first Protestant Archibileop of Canterfury, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. His apastolical virtues were not incompatible with the love of learning; and while her exercised the ardnous office, not of governing, but of founding the Church of England, he streamously applied himself to the study of the Saxon tongue and of English antiquities."—Futhernows Works, iii, 506.

Parker, Richard Green, youngest of seven sons of Rt. Rev. Samuel Parker, D.D., late Bishop of the Prot. Epis. Church in Massachusetts, was b. in Boston, 1798, and graduated at Harvard College, 1817. Having taught in schools and academies in Hanover, Dedham, and Newburyport, in Massachusetts, and in Windsor, Vt., he was placed at the head of one of the public grammar-schools in Boston in 1827, where he continued until 1858, when he opened a school for young ladles, which he taught until 1858. Mr. Parker has been one of the most moother-ful suthers of school-books, (we lack space for the easier mendations before us.) all of which were written darking hours stolen from the scanty leisure of the public service. His manuals are extensively used in the United States, and several of them have been reprinted in London. Of his works, some were published in Boston, and some in the city of New York. Each of the following works which bear his name is comprised in one volume 12mo.

1. Progressive Exercises in English Composition, Bost., 1832. More than appearing the additions of this work have 1832. More than seventy-five editions of this work have been published in this country, and, prior to 1834, fifteen in London. 2. Progressive Exercises in English Grammar, in three parts, Bost., 1834; Lon., 1837. This work was used exclusively in the Boston public schools for nine was used exclusively in the Boston public schools for nine years. 3. Progressive Exercises in Rhetorical Reading, Bost., 1836; Lon., 1837. Afterwards expanded into The Rhetorical Reader, and published in N. York, 1845; last Lon. ed., 1857. 4. Aids to English Composition, Bost., 1848; 20th ed., N. York, 1852. 5. Outlines of General History, 1847; repub. in London; last Amer. ed., 1858. 6. Geographical Questions, N. York, 1848; last ed., 1855. 7. School Compendium of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, Bost., 1837; N. York, 1844; last Lon. ed., 1856. This work was introduced into the Boston public acheals in 1838 and is will (1850) the text-hook in those schools in 1838, and is still (1859) the text-book in those schools. 8. Juvenile Philosophy. N. York, 1850. 9. 1st Series of Five Readers, 1851. 10. The Word-Builder; or, First Lessous in Reading, 1855. 11. A new National Series of Readers and Spelling-Books, with James Madison Watson. of New York: completed in 1858. 12. A History of the Grammar School in the Easterly Parish of Roxbury, Roxbury, 1826. 13. An Elementary Treatise on Chemistry: in preparation, 1859. Mr. Parker was a frequent contributor to the early numbers of the Ladies' Magazine, when published in Boston. He has also writ-ten many critical notices, and other fugitive pieces, for several of the Boston newspapers.

Parker, Robert, a learned Puritan divine, Rector of Wilton, gave offence by publishing (1.) A Discourse against Symbolizing with Antichrist in Ceremonics, 1607; and fied to Holland, where he died, 1614. He also 100() and nod to Holland, where he died, 1614. He also pub.: 2. Parker, Samuel, D.D., 1610-1687, a native of Northampton, of Puritan extraction, was admitted of Wadham College, Oxford, in 1959, but subsequently removed to Trinity College. At the Restoration he changed his party, and attacked his old friends, the Puritans, with great zeal. Itis (1.) Discourse in Vindication of Bishop Bramball and the Church of England from the Fanatic Charge of Popery, prefixed to the Bishop's Vindication of the Episcopal Clergy, 1672, 4to, elicited Andrew Marvell's Robearsal Transposed, 1672-73, 2 vols. 12mo; which swas answered by Parker in (2.) his Reproof to the Repleasal Transposed, 1673, 8vo. But this controversy has been sufficiently noticed by us in our life of Andrew Marvell, sage. Those who would see more must refer to the authorities cited in that article, and to those which we shall presently indicate. In 1867 Parker became Chaplain to Archbishop Sheldon; in 1670, Archdeacon of Can-terbury; in 1672, Prob. of Cantorbury, and Rector of Iokham and Chartham, Kent; and in 1886 he received, as a reward for his willingness to aid James II. in intro-ducing Pepery, the bishopric of Oxford. The illegal at-tempt of the king to force Parker into the presidency of Mardalene College, Oxford, has been already referred to in our notice of Dr. John Hough, D.D., sepra.

Parker, Samuel, son of the preceding, d. 1730, in his 50th year, described as "an excellent scholar, and a man of singular modesty," declined to take the oaths after the Revolution, and therefore never entered into orders. He appears to have had a situation in the Bodleian Library. He married the daughter of a bookseller in Oxford, and his son founded the well-known bookselling establishment to which the British and American public have so long been indebted for many valuable publications. Among the predecessors of the present firm—J. W. and John Henry Parker (see ante)—were Sackville Parker, John Henry Parker (see ante)—were Sackville Parker, grandson of Bishop Parker, who d. Dec. 10, 1796, in his 89th year, and Joseph Parker, nephew and successor to Sackville Parker. See Chalmora's Biog. Dict., xxiv. 126; Nichols's Lit. Anec., iii. 685. The subject of our present article was the author of—1. The last vol. contains an account of the author and his writings, by Dr. Thomas Haywood, of St John's College, to whom most of the dissertations in the work are ascribed. Rev. Thomas Warton (father of Thomas and Joseph Warton) and Dr. Hunt also contributed to and Joseph Warton) and Dr. Hunt also contributed to the work. This is a valuable aid to those who wish to turn readily to patrictical expositions on the Pentateuch. See Orme's Ribl. Bib. In a modern notice of this work now before us, the critic asserts that but, as he does not inform us to which of the many opinions advanced by these gentlemen he refers, we are but little benefited by this information. Parker also pub. his father's De Robus sui Temporis: see PARKER, SANUR., D.D., No. 15.

"Samuel Parker held processly the same opinions as do now the authors of 'The Tracts for the Times;"

Parker, Theodore, b. about 1812, at Lexington,

Mass.; a grandson of Captain John Parker, of Revolutionary memory; became a graduate of the theological school of Cambridge, Mass., in 1836, and subsequently settled at Roxbury as minister of the Second (Unitarian) Church. In 1841 he gave great offence to many of his theological friends by a Discourse on the Transient and Permanent in Christianity, (preached at the ordination of Mr. C. C. Shackford:) and in the next year he widened this breach by the publication of A Discourse of Matters this breach by the publication of A Discourse of Matters relating to Religion. After an absence of between two and three years in Europe, Mr. Parker returned to Boston in the autumn of 1844, and exchanged pulpits for a time with the Rev. Mr. Sargent and Rev. Mr. Clarke, both Unitarian ministers. These three gentlemen all fell under the displeasure of many of their former adherence. Mr. Sargent but his abuseh. Mr. Clarke lost a rents: Mr. Sargent lost his church: Mr. Clarke lost a large number of his congregation; and Mr. Parker yielded to the solicitations of several of his advocates, and established an independent service,—first in the Melodoon, and subsequently in the Music Hall. He styles himself Munister of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society in Boston.

Parnell, Thomas, D.D., 1679-1718, a native of Dublin, and educated at Trinity College in that place, was in 1700 ordained a deacon; about three years afterwards was made a priest; became Archdeacon of Clogher in 1705, and married Anne Minchin, by whom he had two sons and a daughter; lost his wife in 1712, and sought consulation in the bottle; on the recommendation of Swift, obtained a probend from Archbishop King in 1713, and in May, 1716, was presented to the vicarage of Finglass. Parnell was a great favourite with the Whigs, and when they went out of power was welcomed as an ally of the Tories. When Swift introduced him to Lord Bolingbroke, he observes in his journal

"It is pleasant to see one who hardly passed for anything in Ireland make his way here with a little friendly forwarling."

He wrote the Life of Homer (greatly altered, however, by Pope, who remarks, "It is still stiff, and was written much stiffer") prefixed to Pope's version of the Iliad; several papers in the Guardian, Spectator, &c., and many poems. "Hic sedess, Viator, si tu defessus es ambulando."

This invitation must have been very acceptable at times to the learned pedestrian; but doubtless it as often quickened the steps of some honest rustic who mistook it for a scrap of law Latin denouncing summary vengeance on the trespasser. Even on his tomb the Wrestling Baronet is sculptured in his favourite attitude for giving a "back fall." Wood-cuts taken from this singular design are to be found in the Cornish Hugg Wrestler.

Parnell, Thomas. De Contemptu Mundi; trans.

Parnell, Thomas, D.D., 1679-1718, a native of Dublin, and educated at Trinity College in that place, was in 1700 ordained a dencon; about three years afterwards was made a priest; became Archdeacon of Clogher in 1705, and married Anne Minchin, by whom he had two sons and a daughter; lost his wife in 1712, and sought consolation in the bottle; on the recommendation of Swift, obtained a prebend from Archbishop King in 1713, and in May, 1716, was presented to the vicarage of Finglass. Parnell was a great favourite with the Whigs, and when they went out of power was welcomed as an ally of the Tories. When Swift introduced him to Lord Bolingbroke, he observes in his journal

"It is pleasant to see one who hardly passed for anything in Ireland make his way here with a little friendly forwarding."

He wrote the Life of Homer (greatly altered, however, by Pope, who remarks, "It is still stiff, and was written much stiffer") prefixed to Pope's version of the Iliad; reveral papers in the Guardian, Spectator, &c., and many poems. Of the latter a collection was published, in accordance with the author's dying request, by Pope (sold to Lintot for £15) in 1722, 8vo; again, 1728, 8vo; Dubl., 1741, 12mo; with the Life of Parnell, by Goldsmith, Lon., 1770, 8vo; 1772, 8vo; see Goldsmith, Oliven, p. 691, supra. Notes.

"I am free to confess that I can pass from the elder writers and still find a charm in the correct and equable sweetness of Parnell. Conscious that his diction has not the freedom and volubility of the better strains of the elder time, I cannot but remark his exemption from the quaintness and false metaphor which so often disfigure the style of the preceding age, nor deny may respect to the select choice of his expression, the clearness and keeping of his imagery, and the praise alignity of his moral feeling."—Campelli: Essay on English Patry.

Parr, Samuel, D.D., 1747-1825, a native of Harrow-on-the-Hill, where his father was a surgeon and apothecary, after receiving his early education at Harrow School, in his 15th year became a most unwilling row sonce, in his loth year became a most unwilling assistant to his sire in the preparation of medicines for the invalids of the neighbourhood. At length released from this distasteful employment, he was in 1765 entered at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and pursued his studfes there with great relish until obliged by the death of his father to seek for some immediate means of support.

In 1767 we find him one of the assistants in Harrow. In 1767 we find him one of the assistants in Harrow School, and in 1771 he was a disappointed applicant for the mastership of that institution, vacated by the death of Dr. Robert Sumner. Subsequently he kept asked successively at Stanmore, at Colchester in 1776, and at Norwich in 1778. In 1780 he was presented to be rectory of Asterby, Lincolnshire in 1783 obtained that 1611 perpetual curacy of Hatton, Warwickshire, and at the same time received from Bishop Lowik a prebend in the Church of St. Paul. In 1790 he exchanged Hatton for the rectory of Wadenhoe, Northamptonshire, though he still continued to reside at the former place, and, indeed, there spent the remainder of his life, dividing his time between clerical duties, the labours of a school-master, the pleasures of authorship, and the enjoyment of his well-stocked library. In 1802 he was presented by Sir Francis Burdett to the rectory of Graffnam, Hunting-donshire; and in 1820 Queen Caroline appointed him her head chaplain.

As he was a most scalous advocate of the Whig party, it was naturally expected that ecclesiastical preferment would be arged on his behalf, and a popular poet of the day perhaps expressed the common sentiment in the following stanzas:

Part, Lords and Dukes come forward to command;
But who appears at Court the Dector's friend?
His books his riches, and his only rule
A village pulpit or a country school.

The Poet's Fule, by George Dyer, 1797.

What effect these lines may have had upon the consciences of Parr's great friends, we know not; but it appears that about ten years later (in 1807) Parr made a very close approach to the episcopal bench:

"Had my friends continued in power," he tells us, "one fort-night longer, Dr. Hungerford was to have been translated to Hereford, and I was to have had Gloucester. My family arrange-

It is well known that Parr contemplated a life of Dr.

Johnson:

"I intended," he says, "to spread my thoughts over two volumes quarto; and if I had filled three pages the rest would have followed. Often have I lamented my ill fortune in not building this monument to the fame of Johnson, and (let me not be accused of arrogance when I add) my own."

Certainly Parr's life of the great lexicographer (of whom his close imitation procured him an undignified mickname) would have presented an amusing contrast to Beswell's gossiping pages. Nothing less than the dignity of Tacitus and the oratory of Cicero would have been deemed worthy of "the great argument," classical habiliments of Johnson, however, were ill suited to the lesser dimensions of his imitator. With Johnson the ore rotundo style was natural; with Parr it was an

with Parr it was an awkward affectation.

"Of flexibility Parr's style has none; it is totally deficient in the grand secret and capital charm of first-rate composition, light and shade, intention and remission. Instead of freating common things in a common way, and reserving great efforts for great occasions, Parr's mind seems always on the stretch. Notal solel lenter, withit definite, until explicate diorre,"—Green's Diary of a Lover of Let. Lon. Gent. Mag. 1834, Pt. 1, 140.

"His usual somrous ty inpany of words."—DE QUINCRY: Philos. Writers. 1, 110.

"Old Whieliaw mentioned an amusing instances of Dr. Parr's stilled phraseology. In addressing a well-known lawyer (whose name I now lorget) after some great forensic display he had made, Parr said, "Sir. you are incapsible of doing justice to your own argument; you weaken it by diffusion and perplex it by referration."—T. Moore's Memoirs, &c., 1850, vtl. 153.

"The Dector is never simple and natural for a single instant. Every thing smells of the rhetorician. He never appears to forget himself, or to be hurrled by his subject into obvious language. Every expression seems to be the result of artifice and intention.

"Why should Dr. Parr confine this cullogonamis to the literary characters of this island slone? In the University of Benarcs, in the lettered kingdom of Ava, among the Manderins at Pekin, there must, doubtless, be many men who have the eloquence of Bapponos, the feding of Taakopos, and the judgment of Grepos, of whom Dr. Parr might be happy to say that they have profundity without subdety,—comprehensiveness without digression,—and a great number of other things."—Rev. Sydner Share Edin. Rev., 1, 22, 23: Dr. Parr's Systal Symon.

So discouraged. Services So discourseth Sir Nathaniel in Love's Labour Lost, Act V. So. 1.

Did the great Shakspeare imagine a Parr of the future? Southey's comment on Smith's critique was, "When they abuse Parr's style, it is rather a knock at the dead tion, old Johnson," (Letter to C. W. W. Wynn, Dec. 22, 1802;) but this imputation is unjust.

We are sorry to add that a much calmer critic, the Rev. Mr. Blunt, goes so far as to say that

Out of regard to the memory of the Doctor, we have quoted only the most respectful portion of the comments before us. Odoherty is much more severe than the courteous Christopher. But let us balance these strictures by the eulogium of an authority whose "name was us'er more bruited in men's mouths than now," and that not for what he is known, but for what he is supposed, to have done:

"I admired him as a great, illustrious, faulty human being, whose character, like all the noblest works of human composition, should be determined by its excellencies, not by its defeuts."—Sir Philip Prancie's Speech.

What Mr. De Quincoy thinks of Parr's literary pretensions we have already shown the reader, in our notice of

Beilenden, William, p. 162, supra.

The truth is, we imagine, that Parr was a first-rate Latin scholar, more than a second-rate Greek scholar, and a third-, fourth-, and fifth-rate scholar, and no scholar at all, in the various other branches of knowledge included an, in the various other oranged to anowards in belies-lettrea, metaphysics, and the exact sciences. Sydney Smith declares that "he left nothing behind him worth leaving." (Works, i. l. n.;) but Lord Massalay, with a more lenient judgment, characterizes the results of his laboure as

"Without displaying any great power of intellect, he fairly won his way to distinction, and was personally beloved by sallors of all ranks, as well as by his family and friends. He was, emphatically, a good and pious man. Nor were his services few and insignificant. He may be said to have familiarized the navigation of the Arctie to the fancy of the British seauan. ... He was, from his youth to his dying day, an example to the service, and, in other respects, a most meritorious citizen."—

"This is a most curious volume, as illustrative of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It was written by Robert Parsons, the Jesuit, on the publication of the edict against the Catholos. The work commences with an abstract of the lives and actions of Lord Chancellor Bacon, Dudley Earl of Leicester, SF. Walsingham, Sir C. Hatton, and Sr W. Gedi, (atterwards Lord Burtleigh.) against all of whem the writer is very furious. It also contains some singular notices of Sur Francis Drake and Sir Richard Grenville, described as pirates and robbers; also, of Mary Queen of Souts, Henry VIII., Anne Boleyn, Earl of Armidel and Essets, Cardinal Alah, Pole, Cranmar, Throckmorton, W. Stanton, Sir T. Wyat, Udal, Hacket, Behop Jewel, Earl of Sepunout, Sir T. Pope, R. Gage, Duke of Hamilton, Boughas himly; Lord Barnley, husband of the Queen of Scota; Earl of Suesey's Expedition to Scotand, also Lord Scrope's defeat of the Spanish Armada; Dukes of Somerset and Norfolk, Sir T. Howard, Sir John Perroit, Vicercy of Ireland; origin of the Tudors, Owen Tator, Lady Jane Grey, Lady Morley, T. Sherwood; account of the different persons who suffered for their religion in Ragland."

A late eminent authority, referring to this answer and that of F. Cresswell to the edict of Elizabeth, remarks, "It is difficult to speak of these two Tracts with the severity which they deserve. They might please the King of Spain, and append his hope of the conquest of England, but they were calculated to irritate Elizabeth and increase the persecution of the Catholics,"—Da. Livasus.

Man., 1410; PAGET, CHARLES. The object of the Conference, of which Parsons, Cardinal Alan, and Sir Francis Engledeld were the authors, was to support the title of the Infanta in preference to that of James I. The printer was hanged, drawn, and quar-tered, and it was made high treason even to own a copy:

therefore the first cultion is very rare.

Parsons, Thomas William, M.D., h. 1819, at Boston, a son of Thomas W. Parsons, M.D., of that city, travelled in Europe in 1830–37, and again in 1847–48. The results of his observations have to some extent been embodied in the poetry which he has from time to time given to the world. In 1813 he published a volume (Boston, 8vo, pp. 83) containing a creditable translation of The First Ten Cantos of the Inferno of Dante, (see N. Amer. Rev., lvii. 196: Lon. Athen., 1844, 267; Lon. In 1854 Fanny Fern gave to the world her first novel, ntitled Ruth Hall. This work excited much critical discussion; a condemnatory review will be found in the New York Prot. Epis. Quar. Rev. for April, 1855. The author has also been severely consured in other quarters. It had an extraordinary sale, over fifty thousand copies being sold within eight mouths after its publication. In the autumn of 1855 her second novel, entitled Rose Clark, was issued, which also met with great success. In 1856 her second, which also met with great success. her second book for juveniles, the Play-Day Book, was issued; and in 1857 her volume entitled Fresh Leaves was published. Reprinted collectively, and with Lowth's Commentary, from time to time. Abridged ed. of Patrick's Commentary, 1735, 4 vois. 8vo. We have already remarked that Patrick's commentaries are generally pub, with those of Richard Arnald, Moses Lowman, William Lowth, and Daniel Whitby, and have noticed editions of this comprehensive werk, and quoted opinions on Arnald, Lowman, Lowth, and Patrick's portions of it: see pp. 69, 779, 947, 1130, 1141, supra. The folio eds. are in large type, and therefore sometimes preferred; but none of the sets in this size contain Lowman, and but few include Arnald. When Arnald is included, the whole make 6 vols. fol. We notice the following edits. pub. since the ed. edited by Rov. J. R. Pitman, 1822, 6 vols. r. 4to, (see p. 1141, unte.) All of these, as well as Pitman's, contain the whole five commentators,—Arnald, Lowman, Lowth, Patrick, and Whithy,—and all, save Pitman's, have the text of the Scriptures, which the old eds. have not. 1841, 4 vols. 8vo: 1849, 4 vols. imp. 8vo, £3 3s.; 1850, 4 vols. imp. 8vo, £4 10s.; 1853, 4 vols. imp. 8vo; 1857, 4 vols. 1857, 4 vols. imp. 8vo, £3 3s. "Patrick is one of the most sensible and useful commentators on the Old Testamont. He had a competent measure of learning, for the undertaking of which he never makes any ostentations display. . . Neither Patrick nor Lowth has as much Arminansian as Whitby, though they all belong to the same theological school. One of the latest critics upon Patrick's labours is Lord Macaulay, who in his History of England (vol. iii. chap. xiv., 1855) gives specimens of the good prelate's paraphrases of the Psalms of David and the Song of Solomon. It must be allowed that the charge of pro-lixity is pretty well established by the evidence. Paulding, James Kirke, a descendant of Henry
Pawling, an early settler of the State of New York, was born on ancestral ground at Pleasant Valley, Dutchess county, August 22, 1778 On attaining his majority he became an inmate of the house of his accomplished biother in law, William Irving, of New York, and the literary society into which he was thus thrown tended to cultivate a natural taste for humorous satire, which soon bore fruits in the (1) Salmagundi cssays, referred to on a preceding page Sec Invisc, Washington, p 935, supra About ten years after the publication of the last number of this popular periodical, Mr Paulding, in 1819, published (2) a second series of Salmagundi, but the success of the plan was not sufficient to authorize the continuation of the work The numbers pub form 2 vols in the (incomplete) collective cd of Mr Paulding s works

The reference to the authors ' public duties affords a convenient introduction to a brief sketch of the principal incidents of Mr Paulding's career About 1811 he became kirst Secretary to the Board of Naval Commisnoners resigned this office, after a few years tenure, for the post of Navy Agent for the port of New York, which station he held for twelve years, (until 1837,) when he was appointed Secretary of the Navy, and remained in office until the expiration of Picsident Van Burens term Shortly after his retirement from public life (in 1841) Mr Paul ling icmoved to his country wat situated about eight miles above the town of Poughkeepsie, in Dutchess county the farm he occupied being part of the manoi granted by King William the Third to his ancestor, I lipe Pawling, widow of Henry Pawling He rotained He retained a lively interest in letters, and continued the habit of occasionally committing to paper his speculations on topics which engaged his attention. "This poem, as well as the one which follows is, 'The Backwoodsman,' by J. K. Paulding, is a very respectable (to use the words of the preface) and taxteful effusion of the Pope school. The Backwoodsman' is not the best, although its author, we are informed, 'has attained considerable literary celebrity in America'. . . The relative merits of Homer and Mr. Paulding are thus elegantly and judiciously determined in a couplet of some Columbian bard:

"Homer was well enough; but would he ever Have written, think ye, the Backwoodsman? Never!"

Many of the works above enumerated were republished. Many of the works above enumerated were republished, by Harper & Brothers, New York, in 1838, in a uniform starootype edition: this, however, was never completed. Mr. Paulding contributed Childe Roeliff's Pitgrimags, and Selim the Friend of Mankind, to the Tales of the Glauber Spa, (edited by Robert C. Sands;) Odds and Ends, by an Obsolete Author, to the New York Literary World; and, as already stated, many papers (both in prose and verse) to various periodicals. Of these may be mentioned The New York Mirror, The Analectic, The Knickerboeker, (Fraham's Magazine, Godev's Lady's Rook, the Demography. Graham's Magazine, Godey's Lady's Book, the Demo-cratic Review, the United States Review, the Literary World, Wheaton's National Advocate, the National In-telligencer, the Southern Press, and the Washington Union. We quote a few opinions on Mr. Paulding's writings:

opinions on Mr. Paulding's writings:

"In Salmagund, The Mirror for Travellers, John Bull and Brother Jonathan, and his other writings, Mr. Paulding has given, aimost every sort of facetious and astirical composition. He deals more largely than Irving in the whundled and the burlesque, and he is wanting in the exquisite refinement which lends such a charm to theoffrey Crayon's humour. The follies of men are often confirmed, rather than cured, by undisguised attacks. . . Mr. Paulding's novels are distinguished for considerable descriptive powers, skill in character-writing, natural humour, and a strong national feeling, which gives a tone to all his works. The Dutchman's Fireside, and Westward Hol have the fidelity of historical pictures, and they are the best we have the fidelity of historical pictures, and they are the best we have the fidelity of historical pictures, and they are the best we have the fidelity of historical pictures, and they are the best we have for the early settlers of New York and Kentucky."—Crissold's Irose Writers of America, 1852, 29, 35.

"There is no better literary manner than the manner of Mr. Paulding. Certainly no American, and possibly no living writer.

Trone Writers of America, 1852, 29, 35.

There is no better literary manner than the manner of Mr. Patching. Certainly no American, and possibly no living writer of England, has more of those numerous peculiarities which go to the formation of a happy style. It is questionable, we think, whether any writer of any country combines as many of these poculiarities with as much of that essential negative virtue, the absence of affectation."—Engan A. Pon: Literat, 1850, 574.

"His works are exclusively and eminently national, and his descriptions of matural accessey are often singularly beautiful."—Lon. Altern, 1853, 11: Lit. of the Ninelcoult Contry: America, "Without any disparagement of such reputation as Mr. Paulding may have gained in his own country, the English have never ranked his among their favourite American movelists. According to our estimation, Cooper, Miss Sedgwick, Warre, and even lifts, come before him; to say nothing of writers who have succeeded in the short story,—as widely differing in colour and intention as Irving and Hawthorne and William Greenwood. We know few authors to whom the epithase titesome can be more deliberately and justify applied than to Mr. Paulding. He conceives himself to be jocose when he is only dreary; he makes a boast of his subtlety while exhibiting to us the commonest slight-of-hand tricks of the tale-trader. But we must still remnia the reader that such are precisely the qualities on which national tastes and sympathics are apt to disagree. Prophets have different honours and dishonours as home and abroad."—Lon. Athen., 1849, 1206.
"Ecrivain essentiellement Américain, il porte partout dans ses écrits l'emprelute de sa nationalité. Il a l'esprit fin et aarcastique. Pas verve éclute on traits pittoresques; mais i manque de mesure, frapse fort plutôt que juste, et tient peu de compte des règles ou des conventions."—Diet. surierest des Contemporains, par G. Vsporeau, Parla, 1858, 1348.

Paxton, Sir Joseph, Kut., M.P., b. of humble parentage, in 1803, at Milton-Bryant, near Woburn, Bed-Folkhir, heavest Children, 1864. fordshire, became a gardener at Chiswick, the seat of the Duke of Devenshire; was removed by his Grace to Chatsworth, and there effected those architectural and horticultural wonders which have made his name famous in two continents. After rojecting 234 designs, (their own plan included,) the Building Committee of the Great Industrial Exhibition of 1851 accepted the proposition of Mr. Paxton, and at his command the fair proportions of Mr. Paxton, and at his command the fair proportions of the Crystal Palace arose in all their magnificence and beauty. But in the construction of the new Crystal Palace at Sydenham he had an opportunity, which he used to good purpose, of still further displaying his power of combining elegance and grandeur with con-venience and utility. In the organization and home superintendence of the Army Works Corps employed in the Crimean War, 1854, he exhibited ready invention and no small administrative ability. He was M.P. for Coventry from 1854 until his death, June 8, 1865. A statue to his memory is to be creeted in the gardens of the Crystal Palace, Sydenham. 1. Payne, John Howard, 1792-1852, a native of the city of New York, at the early age of 13 became editor of the Thespian Mirror, whilst a student at Union College, Schenectady; pub. in 1807 25 Nos. of a periodical called The Pastime; and in his 16th year made his first called The Pastime; and in his 16th year made his first appearance on the stage, (Park Theatre, New York,) as Young Norval. After a wandering career as an actor and dramatic author, he received the appointment of American Consul at Tunis; and, after a visit to the U. States, during which he was reappointed to Tunis, he returned to die in that city. He was never married. He published in London a periodical called The Opera-Glass; and on a visit to America, in 1832, issued the Glass; and on a visit to America, in 1832, issued the prospectus of a weekly magazine, at $10 per annum, to be entitled Jam Jehan Nina, (The Goblet wherein you may behold the Universe;) but this project was never carried out. In 1815 he pub. Lisping of the Muse: Selection from Juvenile Poems chiefly written at and before the Age of Sixteen, Lon., 1815, pp. 30. Of his fugitive pieces perhaps the best-known are a series of papers on Our Noglected Poets; and an account of East Instrument, which was published in the Demogratic Review. He was the author of the plays of Britten at the Fall of Tarquin, (1820,) Virginius, and Charles the Second, (in which Charles Kemble frequently played;) and his name is attached to the following dramatic pieces, (and perhaps others,) all of which, we believe, are translations from the French. 1. The Maid and the Magpie. 2. Accusation. 3. Theresa. 4. The Lencers. 5. Oswali of Athens. 6. Peter Smink. 7. Twas I: Adeline. 8. Ali Pacha. 9. Clari; or, The Maid of Milan. But it is as the author of Home, Sweet Home, (words adapted to an old Sicilian melody.) which occurs in adapted to an old Sicilian melody,) which occurs in Clari, or The Maid of Milan, that Payne has acquired a lasting reputation. The publishers of this song are said (we doubt it) to have cleared by it, for the bunefit of Charles Kemble, the manager of the theatre, two thousand guineas within two years after its first pub-lication; and by the year 1832 it was computed that more than 100,000 copies had been sold. See two articles on Payne in New York Mirror, 1832, (by Theodore S. Ray;) Memoirs of John Howard Payne, the American Roscius; Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. The United States Government has recently erected a monument over the Government has recently erected a monument over the remains of Payne in the cemetery of St. George at Tunis; and subscriptions for a bust of the author of Sweet Home, by John A. Jackson, of Boston, from an original daguerrootype in possession of C. H. Brainard, were soli-elted in 1858. From the daguerrotype just referred to, photographic portraits were taken in Buston in 1857.

Peale, Rembrandt, son of Charles Willson Peale, b. in the vicinity of Philadelphia, in 1778, and still living, (1859,) has acquired considerable reputation as an artist and is not without substantial claims to the honours of authorship. 1. Reminiscences on Art and Artists, pub. in The (New York) Crayon. 7. Notes of the Painting-Room. This journal, which is now, but we trust will not long be, in MS., records Mr. Pealu's artistic experiences for a period of sixty years. He contributed to Cincinnati Literary Gazette, 1824. When a youth, in 1795, Mr. Peale painted an admirable portrait of Washington from the original, the faithfulness of which was generally acknowledged. An account of this portrait, accompanied with a biographical sketch of the artist, will be found in Harper's (New York) Magazine for June, 1857. A very complimentary notice of Mr. Peale's abilities as an artist occurs in Blackwood's Magazine for Aug. 1824, 132, 133. See, also, Tuckerman's Character and Portraits of Washington, 1859, 4to. A character and Portraits of Washington, 1859, 4to. A biographical sketch was appended to an account of his great picture, The Court of Death, pub. in pamphlet form a number of years since. From this picture, painted in 1829, Dr. C. Q. Colton, of New York, in Dec. 1859, commenced the issue of 100,000 chromo-lithographic engravings, 23×31, at 31 each. Reinbrandt Peale d. Oct. 3, 1860. Reprinted, with addits, from a MS. in the Lambeth Library, in Wordsworth's Eccles. Biog., vol. v. Peckard had the advantage of the materials collected by John Ferrar, brother of Nicholas, and for three years Deputy Governor of the Virginia Company. Much of the History of the Virginia Company is contained in Peckard's Managing of Ferrar; and the work should be appointed. Memoirs of Forrar; and the work should be reprinted in the United States. See the First Records of Anglo-American Colonisation: Their History, by John Wingate Thornton, Bost., 1859, p. 7. It is a curious fact, to thich Mr. Thornton calls our attention, that among the MS. left, and according to Peckard written, by Ferrar, are a number of Short Histories (so called by Peckard) which appear by the titles to be the same stories which are contained in Fuller's Holy and Profane State. Mr. Theraton remarks,

"Kuller's work was published in 1640; Ferrar died Dec. 1637; pet antong Ferrar's MSS, are found the exact 'contents' of Fuller's health Did Fuller loud his MSS. to Forer full eleven years helpe it was published? It is incredible."

"For forty years Sir Robert Peel stood in the political area, always fighting, and most frequently victorious. On the eve of his death he still stood erect, but at peace, is his place in Parliament, shedding the light of his wisdom, without upposition, over the politics of his country, and serencity sujoying his ascendency, which all recognised. He died lamented both by his sovereign and by the people, respected and admired by the adversaries whom he had overcome as well as by the friends who had conquered with him."—M. Gurger: Memore of Mr. Robert Peel.

This ed. has been already noticed: see Drog, Rev. ALEXANDER. The early eds. of the separate pieces of Peele, a number of which have been reprinted from time to time, (see Bohn's Lowndea's Bibl. Man., Pt. 7, 1861, 1815,) have been sold at high prices: The Araynement of Paris, 1584, 4to, (see Retrosp. Rev., iii. 97-126,) produced at the sale of faglis's Old Plays, 82, £15 4s. 6d.; Steevens's copy (sale Me. 1269) of The Old Wives Tale, 1955, 4to, was sold for £12; and Dibdin, in 1824, estimated its value at "three times that sum," (Lib. Comp., 791;) The Love of King David and Fair Betheabe, with the Tragedie of Absolon, 1599, 4to, brought £5 15s. 6d. at the White Knight's sale, £833;) and the Merrie Conceited lests of George Peele, seches to Queen Elizabeth at Theobald's; (8333;) and the Merric Conceited Lests of George Peele, was sold at the Roxburghe sale, 6685, for £7 7s. rarest ed. of this work, s. a., was reprinted, 1809, 4to.
The Battle of Alonzar was sold at Inglis's sale for £5; The Battle of Aloazar was sold at Inglus's sale for £5; Thorpe markeds at £0 18s. 6d.; and in J. Lilly's Bibl. Auglo-Curiusa, 1869, p. 170, it is priced £6 6s. In his aptice of Peele, Wood does not give a very flattering account of the worldly prosperity of the sons of the Muse: "This person," he remarks, "was living in his middle age, in the latter end of Q. Elizabeth, but when or where he died I cannot tell; for so it is, and always hat been, that most poet die goor, and consequently obscurely, and a hard matter it is to trace them to their graves."—Athen. Grow., Bliss's od., i. 689. It was actually not an account of want of praise

It was certainly not on account of want of praise It was certainly not on account of want of praise among his contemporaries that Peale remained poor. Greene tells us that he was "no less deserving than Marlow and Lodge: in some things rarer, in nothing inferior," (Greatesworth of Wit, 1592;) and Nash indiges in a still higher strain of eulogy:

"If dare commend thorge Peele unto all that know him, as the obler supporter of pleasance new living, the atlas of poetrie, and primum verborem artifex; whose first increase, the Arraignment of Arraign and the property of the property of the state of the pregnant dexister of the pregnant dexister gasains dramatic post of our language. His David an i Math sabe is the earliest fountain of faither and harmony that can be traced in our dramatic postry. His fancy is rich, and his feeling tender; and his conceptions of dramatic character have no inconsiderable mixture of soils vencity and ideal beauty. There is no such sweetness of varification and imagery to be found in our high verse anterior to chakepeare."—Compbell's Specimens.

"I must concur with Mr. Cuiller in thinking these compliments excessive. Peele has some command of imagery, but in every other quality it seems to me that he has scarce any claim to honour; and I doubt if there are three lines together in any of his plays that could be mistaken for Shakapeare's: . . The versification of Peole is much inferior to that of Marlowe, and, though sometimes poetical, he seems rarely dramatic."—Hat lam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii, 172.
